The Menominee Indians have something over $2,000,000 in the United States Treasury. They have never asked for anything at the hands of this Government and are making considerable progress in civilization. There are about 300 Menominees on the Indian reservation in Wisconsin that are engaged in agricultural pursuits, and they are tilling between 2,500 and 2,700 acres of land, from which they raised approximately $33,000 worth of products. They own live stock of the value of between forty and fifty thousand dollars. I had the pleasure of visiting the Menominee fair, conducted by the Indians on the reservation, in September, 1915, and I was surprised to see what these Indians were doing. They had very fine exhibits of grain, corn, potatoes, and dairy products, besides the handiwork of their women and their children in their industrial school. They are making considerable progress in dairying and stock raising, and if this bill passes, which I believe it will, and they are allowed money from their own funds to buy stock, clear land, build sanitary homes to live in, as my amendment provides, they will have an opportunity of making more rapid progress. The act of 1908 gave the Secretary of the Interior the right to build a sawmill on the Indian reservation, and he is employing a good many Indians in running this sawmill, and as fast as the land is cleared the Secretary proposes to give these Indians allotments. And if this appropriation passes, he will advance money to them, which is reimbursable, to help them in clearing lands and get them started as farmers. Cut-over lands which were formerly covered with heavy timber are hard to clear, and it requires, besides hard work, teams, stump pullers, and heavy equipment. No race of people without help, money, or equipment could make any progress in agriculture on such lands. When these lands are cleared they are wonderfully fertile and will outlast the easier-cleared prairie lands.

I believe the Menominee Indians, if given the aid that this bill contemplates, will make great progress in agriculture and civilization, and if they do, and I am given an opportunity, I will ask for double the amount of this appropriation for them in the next Congress.

The Menominee Indians have been practically on this reservation for several hundred years. Away back in 1638, when Nicolet, the explorer, discovered the Menominee River, he found the Menominee Indians there. They assisted him as they did Marquette and Joliet a little later in navigating the Fox and ultimately finding the Mississippi River. Their lands extended at that time down to the Fox River and the Wolf. In 1848 they were placed upon this reservation on the Wolf River in the district I represent, and they have been there ever since that time. The Menominee Reservation embraces a territory of 350 square miles and abounds in beautiful streams and lakes and picturesque scenery.

The Menominees have never caused the Government any trouble, and during the sixties, when President Lincoln called for volunteers, that call penetrated the wilderness of Wisconsin, and the patriotic Menominees responded and raised over a company of soldiers from this reservation. These volunteer Indian soldiers gave a good account of themselves in the war and were as brave men as ever shouldered a gun. To-day they have their Grand Army posts and their Women's Relief Corps, and it shows that they are not only patriotic, but they are progressive, and they have given an excellent account of themselves working in the woods logging and in the Indian sawmill and wherever they have been given a chance.

A number of their prominent men wrote me a letter some time last February, asking that they might have some of their funds, to be used in the way my amendment specifies. They have on this reservation something between two billion and two and one-half billion feet of virgin timber, probably the finest tract of timber in the world. There are between 1,700 and 1,800 of these Menominees, and each of them is worth from $10,000 to $15,000. They think it is no more than right that they be given their own money and be allowed to build sanitary homes and have enough money to buy teams and farming equipment, so that they can start in and make some progress in agriculture.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and also to put into the RECORD a letter from some of the Menominees asking that this appropriation of $300,000 be given them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the papers referred to:

NEOPIT, WIS., February 10, 1915.

Hon. EDWARD E. BROWNE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At various times our superintendent has brought to our attention the desires of the United States Indian Office for progress of the Indian. He, through his farmers, has inaugurated and is pushing a campaign for increase of farming activities amongst our people, and is, no doubt, aiding them to such an extent as is possible with the implements furnished him.

We desire very much as Indians representative of the efforts the Government has put forth in the past to set out to you some facts which are vital to the success of any plan concerning our welfare and in which you must be interested. We aim not to represent any feeling or faction. What we propose is a consensus of the very best thought of we Indians, who have been reared on our reservation, educated in the Indian schools of the Nation, returned home to make our own way and blaze a path for our people.

First, we shall consider our people, numbering to-day 1,726 members. Of this number 70 per cent may be considered of various degrees of Indian blood, 50 per cent or more one-half blood and less. Our people can be safely divided into three classes:

Competent.—Embracing those who earn their own living by daily wage or farming and have such degree of education as to be able to read, write, and speak English, and understand ordinary business transactions.

Semicompetent.—Those who earn a living, but through lack of education, with no understanding of English, could be imposed upon enough so as to make it not yet the time to let them handle financial affairs without supervision.

Incompetent.—The old and aged, the widow, the orphan, children, the helpless through disease or accident, and those Indians not self-supporting or those who through habits would waste financial resources and then become a burden on others.

Sixty per cent of our people have some part of an education, acquired either through schools or by residence amongst whites have picked up English so that they can converse intelligently.

We have at Keshena Government school giving industrial training to our children, as well as mission school doing the same under contract.

At Neopit is the timber operation of the reserve, embracing large mill and manufacturing 40,000,000 feet of lumber yearly, and two day schools, Government and mission, for educational purposes.

The reservation consists of 10 townships of land, the western portion heavily timbered and the eastern part cut-over lands or open stands.

Two facts face us: That of earning a living by daily labor at the Menominee Lumber Mills plant; while not detracting a moment from its value as a center for industrial and social development, we have to consider this—that it but teaches the Indian to labor, which earnings are principally spent for subsistence. The other opening left to the Indian for development is agriculture in all its various phases—stock, dairy, general farming.

We have provided educational facilities for our children, industrial education and wages for the able-bodied who desire work, but for the class who should be of the most value to all there is no way out.

A remedy for this would be the depositing to the individual credit of each member of the tribe justly on the rolls by right of descent by blood as a Menominee Indian of a sufficient sum that would at once give him a good start.

If each member had to his credit $500, this would give a man and wife $1,000 between them—ample means for a good start in farming. It would be an inducement to young people coming of age to take hold and they, too, make a start. It would provide the aged or totally helpless, the widow, and the orphan child with ample to live out their lives.

With close supervision, every interest would be protected; those whom it might be feared would waste their share could be restrained until individual effort on their part showed they had mended their habits and would not become a dependent on their more careful brother members—regulation carefully prescribed that would induce or reward good agricultural or industrial effort.

We have here a certain number of members who farm in a way, and outside of the small number each year who can obtain aid through rembursable fund—about 25 or 30—none can go ahead through lack of means, and even these, when they should be enlarging and clearing, have to turn out to work to earn money to meet reimbursable payments.

For 10 years past and longer our children have been coming back from the Indian schools, and, excepting ordinary labor, they have nothing or means with which to start in to display what has been taught them and learned at school.

Common labor soon takes initiative away from men. Indian boys learning farming and dairy work at school have no chance to start in on return home, because old folks not able to give them a chance. Young women educated in home making and the woman's part on a farm have nothing to start themselves, and when they take a husband he has nothing to look forward to but a job some place at which he can earn wages.

Some of our people will no doubt always be workmen, but from birth, this and several generations past first saw light in the little farmhouse. Before 1908 we were all an agricultural people; from early times our people tilled the soil in some degree. Agricultural pursuits mean independence to the Indian. We would be a producer rather than a consumer. We have the land but lack the individual means.

We ask and solicit your aid in thought and action for us for real first aid in line with our wish. We present you in crude form our idea in shape of a proposed bill, which is capable of improvement, no doubt. If something in this line could be pushed through, a long start would be made in accomplishing what the United States Indian Office here wishes, what you wish, and what we desire to see and know will happen, a permanent improvement in every single condition on the reservation—health, wealth, and real progress.

Sincerely and respectfully,

PETER LOOKAROUND.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT SUGGESTED AS WAYS AND MEANS.

An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian Tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916.

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States, at his discretion, the sum of $600,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the principal sum on deposit to the credit of the Menominee Tribe of Indians in the State of Wisconsin, to make a pro rata share $500 each, arising under act of Congress approved June 12, 1890 (26 Stat., 146), and to use the same for the purpose of promoting civilization and self-support among said Indians in manner and for purposes provided for in this act: Provided, That not to exceed $30,000 of this amount may be used in building of homes and clearing of land for deserving and needy Indians, to encourage them in agriculture and stock pursuits, and that not to exceed the sum of $10,000 of this amount may be used to purchase such stock, seeds, implements, and household goods, to encourage and improve home condition and aid in self-support: Provided further, That the balance of this sum appropriated, as hereinbefore named, shall be distributed pro rata to the present enrolled members of the tribe at the time of passage of this act, and that this pro rata share shall be deposited to the individual credit of each member of the tribe as individual Indian moneys are now deposited, and under the regulations for same.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, on last Saturday, when the school item for Oklahoma was under consideration, there was some discussion as to how long the appropriations had been made in aid of the schools of eastern Oklahoma. The statement I made at that time was that appropriations for similar purposes in aid of schools had been made for the past 10 years. This statement was called in question, and I stated then that I held in my hand a book containing the act of 1908 and other acts, and that, with the exception of the appropriation act of 1911, in those acts appropriations had been made in aid of schools for the past 10 years. I understand that during my absence from the Chamber there was a recurrence to the discussion of this question this afternoon.

Now, in order that there may be no mistake about it, I looked it up. There may be a little difference in the language of these appropriations; one may be to aid the Indian schools which the whites attended, or the other may be to aid the white schools to which the Indians were admitted, but it was for exactly the same purpose. And let me say, Mr. Chairman, that I have verified my statement—it was correct—and that these appropriations had been made for the length of time that I have indicated. And I know personally, Mr. Chairman, that these appropriations have been disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior by exactly the same officers and for the same purposes in eastern Oklahoma.

Now, I desire to call attention to a book entitled "Laws Relating to the Five Civilized Tribes." On page 514 of that book is an extract from the Indian appropriation act approved June 21, 1906, which is 10 years ago, which reads as follows:

For the maintenance, strengthening, and enlarging of the tribal schools of the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole Nations, and making provision for the attendance of children of parents of other than Indian blood therein, and the establishment of new schools under the control of the Department of the Interior, the sum of $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior and disbursed by him under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

Now I will read from page 528 of the same book, which is a part of the Indian appropriation bill approved March 1, 1907, and it has a provision where the language, I believe, is exactly the same, providing for an appropriation of $300,000 for this same purpose.

I invite attention to page 538, which contains an extract from the Indian appropriation bill of the next year, 1908, making an appropriation for $300,000, and I believe the language is exactly similar to that of the year previous.

I invite attention also to page 552, which is an extract from the Indian appropriation bill of the next year, approved March 3, 1909, and that is an appropriation of $150,000.

I invite attention, further, to page 557 of this book, which contains the Indian appropriation bill approved April 4, 1910, and that has an appropriation of $75,000.

Mr. NORTON. In what words?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is on page 557. I stated the other day there was no appropriation carried in the act of 1911. Now I desire to call attention to page 574, which is the Indian appropriation bill approved August 24, 1912, which contains the following language:

The sum of $300,000, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, in aid of the common schools in the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole Nations in Oklahoma, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

I desire also to call attention to an item in the appropriation bill for the year 1914, found on page 577. That bill was approved June 30, 1913. It contains an appropriation of $300,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HASTINGS. I ask unanimous consent to continue for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to continue for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to page 583 of this book, which contains a provision appropriating $275,000. This is from the Indian appropriation bill approved August 1, 1914.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I also call attention to the resolution of last year, which continues this same item into this year. So it will be seen that I am not mistaken about it when I say that appropriations were made, beginning as early as 1906, and even prior to that time, and that these provisions were made in aid of the common schools. Sometimes they might have been for the strengthening of tribal schools where whites attended; others may have been made for white schools where the Indians attended; but in each instance these appropriations have been used in eastern Oklahoma under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior for the purpose of strengthening the common schools in the rural districts of eastern Oklahoma. And I want to say that my statements are all substantially correct, as shown by these various items in these Indian appropriation bills to which I have called attention; and while I have not had time to look up the exact amounts, appropriations were made even before 1906, or more than 10 years ago.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, no one has questioned the fact that appropriations have been made for schools in Oklahoma for many years. We carry a great many items in this bill for Indian schools in many States. We carried items for Indian schools in Oklahoma and in the Five Civilized Tribes for many years. No one has questioned that statement. The proposition in the bill against which I made a point of order the other day was to appropriate $300,000 for aid to the common public schools of Oklahoma, and the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] who has just taken his seat, speaking of that made this statement:

Now, Congress, recognizing that that would be an injustice to the new State, as early as the appropriation bill of 1907—

Which, by the way, was before there was a State there—appropriated $300,000 in aid of the schools in a provision in language similar to this provision.

Now, as a matter of fact, the language in the appropriation act of 1907 distinctly stated that it was for the tribal schools of certain tribes, naming them. If that is language similar to the language in this bill, appropriating money for aid of the public schools in Oklahoma, then I must admit that I fail to understand properly the English language. The gentleman was inaccurate. I do not think he intentionally misled the House, nor do I think that what he said had any final effect upon whether the point of order would be made, so the gentleman is not chargeable in any way with misleading anyone except myself. But when my distinguished friend, holding something in his hand, said that he held in his hand the act of 1908, which carried an item of $300,000 in language similar to the provision of this bill, I assumed that he was completely accurate, though the language is not similar to this language in this bill nor was the appropriation $300,000.

Mr. HASTINGS. How much was the appropriation?

Mr. MANN. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MANN. I am not mistaken.

Mr. HASTINGS. I call the gentleman's attention to the act of 1908. The appropriation was $300,000. I have the act here in my hand. I know the gentleman wants to be correct about it, but he is mistaken, and if he will let me do so, I will read it.

Mr. MANN. Go ahead and read it.

Mr. HASTINGS. This is the act approved April 30, 1908:

For the maintenance, strengthening, and enlarging of the tribal schools of the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole Nations, and making provision for the attendance of children of parents of other than Indian blood therein, and the establishment of new schools under the control of the Department of the Interior, the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior and disbursed by him under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

So you can see it was for the purpose of allowing white people to attend the Indian schools; and it is just a question whether you appropriate it and use it in the Indian schools and let the white children attend, or whether, since statehood, you call them white schools and let the Indians attend. It is one and the same thing, disbursed by the same department, and by exactly the same officers in eastern Oklahoma as it has always been in the past 10 years.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may see no distinction, and evidently he does not, between appropriating money for Indian schools to which whites are permitted to go under a Territorial form of government and appropriating money for the maintenance of the public schools of the State, to which Indians are admitted. I can see a very great distinction.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman will permit me, before statehood the appropriations, I think, usually ran for tribal schools, but since statehood and since the tribal schools were abolished—as members of the Indian Committee will remember, the tribal schools ran for a few years after statehood—then the provision was modified in its language.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, before leaving the items relating to Wisconsin I would like to say just a word about the Indian reservations in that State in the district which I represent.

Much has been said during the consideration of this bill, and much is said every year, of the lack of progress of the Indians, and that it is impossible for the Indians to become farmers or to engage successfully in agricultural pursuits. That lack of progress does exist to a large degree in the Indian reservations in Wisconsin. I have four of those reservations in my district. That lack of progress, however, is not primarily due to a lack of desire upon the part of the Chippewa Indians to enter upon farming. It is largely due to the fact that while every Indian has an allotment of land, there are no roads to his allotment, the lands are not taxed, and there is no way by which roads can be provided through taxation. The Government will not provide any money for the building of roads, either through gratuities or otherwise, and the consequence is that, except where there happens to be a road built by a lumber company or by a county, there is no possibility of the Indians in that section becoming farmers.

The few roads we do have I have traveled over, and the Indian allotments upon them are occupied by good houses and good clearings, and the Indian is developing splendidly; but that is probably not more than 1 per cent of the territory affected by the Indian reservation, and the time must soon come when we must either provide some means of building roads on the Indian reservations or abolish the reservations and allow taxation of lands in order that the roads and facilities may be constructed on them. We appropriate money in every bill for furnishing farmers, teaching the Indians how to farm; we give them an allotment, and it is absolutely valueless to the Indian, and would be to a white man, if we gave them an allotment and provided no means whatever by which we could reach that allotment.

I see no reason why a scheme could not be devised with reference to the building of roads on reservations similar to that which we provide for the irrigation of allotted lands—the Government advancing the money and making it a lien on the allotments benefited, to be repaid to the Government at such time as the property may be disposed of by the Indians.

I have had that matter up with the Bureau of Indian Affairs a number of times, but so far it has not received favorable consideration. I have not offered any amendment to this bill, because I realized it would be subject to a point of order and go out, and I also realized that to attempt to secure such legislation without a favorable report from the Indian Department would be fruitless. But I do hope that before another year rolls around some means can be devised to build roads on these reservations so as to make the allotments accessible and enable the Indian who desires to use the allotment for agricultural purposes to do so.

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 32 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman from North Carolina wait until the bill is concluded?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I shall be obliged to object.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask the gentleman to defer the request until the bill is completed.

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the request.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the work of constructing an irrigation system within the diminished Shoshone or Wind River Reservation, in Wyoming, including the maintenance and operation of completed canals, $50,000; reimbursable in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1905, and to remain available until expended.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, as a separate paragraph, following the paragraph just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new paragraph, page 58, following line 21, the following: "To enable the Secretary of the Interior to have prepared and submitted to Congress at the beginning of the next regular session plans and estimates of the character and cost of structures necessary for completing the irrigation of all the irrigable land of the Shoshone or Wind River Reservation, in Wyoming, $3,000."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. To that, Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think the item is not subject to a point of order. It calls on the Secretary of the Interior to make a report in regard to a work in progress, and for which we appropriate $50,000 in the item that precedes this one.

I want to discuss very briefly the irrigation situation on the Wind River Reservation. The reservation contains about 750,000 acres of land of which about 75,000 acres are irrigable. We began about 16 years ago the construction of a general system covering all these lands, and as time has gone on the appropriations being comparatively small each year, the work has been done almost wholly on the part of the system lying south of the Little Wind River which divides the reservation. The time has arrived when it is very important in the development of this general project that we shall speed up a little and begin working on ditches upon which little work has been done up to this time. My understanding is that it will cost $300,000 to $400,000 to complete the project on the diminished reserve. We ought to know from the Secretary just what the cost will be in order that it may be speedily completed.

I introduced a bill, which went to the Committee on Indian Affairs, asking for an additional appropriation of $200,000 in order that we might have the work expedited on this general project, especially on the Big Wind River ditch. The bill was adversely reported upon by the Secretary of the Interior on the ground that some of their maps and plans of surveys had been destroyed by fire.

The Secretary further stated that the funds are more needed elsewhere. It is evident that the Secretary has been pretty liberal in his estimates elsewhere, but I have no complaint to make of that. I have no complaint to make of the large sums in this bill or those that will be in the sundry civil bill for Indian irrigation, but I was surprised that this project did not receive more favorable consideration at the hands of the Secretary. This is a splendid project, in a good country. It is good land. Twenty thousand acres are being irrigated largely by the Indians, and if this item be adopted the Secretary of the Interior will inform us next fall what it will cost to complete the project as a whole. I then hope for goodly appropriations to put it through.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman's amendment says "complete the irrigation of all the irrigable lands in the Shoshone or Wind River Reservation." Does that imply that there are other irrigable lands not under ditches?

Mr. MONDELL. Not to any great extent. The irrigable land on this reservation is mostly under ditches that at one time and another have been surveyed out.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has it been approved of by Congress?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; by continuous appropriations.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this must first be approved by Congress, and before it can be presented to Congress for approval it must be presented to the department.

Mr. MONDELL. The treaty with the Indians cited in the previous paragraph provided for the irrigation of the irrigable lands on the reservation, and immediately after the treaty was adopted we continued the construction—we had begun upon it before—of a system for the irrigation of the irrigable lands of the reservation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then the law authorizing this work to be done was in a treaty and not a special act of Congress.

Mr. MONDELL. It was in a treaty which was embraced as part of the legislation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I was out of the Chamber for a moment when the paragraph on page 58, lines 11 to 14, was passed. That makes appropriation of $1,700 from the amount "heretofore collected as rentals of buildings at said post." I think that language "from the amount heretofore collected as rentals of buildings at said post" should go out. That would come in as miscellaneous receipts. Beginning with the first page of the bill, it is providing that the "following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated." The money that comes in from these rentals has been put into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. There is no separate account kept out of which you can pay the particular appropriation provided for in lines 11 to 14 on page 58. Such moneys go into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. We appropriate money not out of specific funds but out of funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. This would cause a complicated set of bookkeeping in the Treasury that would be much more costly than the sum of money that is here appropriated.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then the gentleman's amendment would simply strike out the words "from the amount heretofore collected as rentals of buildings at said post"?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I accept the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to that paragraph for the purpose of offering the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to the paragraph indicated for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, on page 58, in lines 13 and 14, the words "from the amount heretofore collected as rentals of buildings at said post."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 58, line 13, strike out the following language:
"From the amount heretofore collected as rentals of buildings at said post."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 8, line 20, for the purpose of offering an amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to return to page 8, line 20, for the purpose of offering an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 20, amend the paragraph as amended by striking out the word "one," in line 20, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "two."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I can not consent to that, for the reason that it raises the question that would take us hours to discuss. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 32 of the bill for the purpose of offering the amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Before that is read by the Clerk, the Chair desires to call the attention of the committee to the paragraph on page 8, beginning on line 14. That paragraph has been amended so as to provide for one warehouse instead of three. On page 20 the word "warehouses" occurs, and it should be "warehouse."

Mr. NORTON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that that amendment be made.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I shall have to object unless the gentlemen want to return and open up the paragraph for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. This is simply an error in spelling.

Mr. IGOE. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman should return to the paragraph.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would rather let the bill remain as it is than to return to the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. It does not make any difference. The law says the singular is the same as plural.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to return to page 32 for the purpose of offering an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting at the end of line 13, on page 32, the words:
"For the construction of a bridge across the Ocona Lufty River as an approach to said school, $15,000, said amount to be reimbursed from any funds which the Cherokee Indians in North Carolina may now have or may hereafter have to their credit in the Treasury of the United States."
And in line 15, on page 32, by striking out "$36,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$51,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Chairman, a bill was introduced by me asking for an appropriation of $15,000 for the purpose of constructing a bridge across the Ocona Lufty River, which runs between the lands of the Cherokee Indians in North Carolina and the Government lands on which the Indian school at the village of Cherokee is located, the object being to get a bridge across which the Indians may pass in going to and from their reservation to the school and the Indian village. I took up the matter informally with the Indian Bureau and an investigation was made, and it was informally indicated that the bureau would approve the bill, as it was regarded as a necessity, but by some inadvertence the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs did not forward the bill to the bureau. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs told me it would be sent to the bureau, but by some inadvertence, unintentional, I know, it was not forwarded and a report on the measure was not made.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order against it. Does the gentleman reserve the point of order or insist on it?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I object to returning to this point in the bill, and I raise the point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 37, line 1, to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to return to page 37 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. It should be read first.

Mr. IGOE. But the gentleman is asking unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 37, line 1, strike out the next to the last proviso in the paragraph beginning on page 37, line 1, and adopted by the committee, said proviso being in words as follows:

"Provided further, That no part of the sum appropriated by this paragraph shall be paid to attorneys."

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, in explanation——

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say I do not see why the committee should return to various places in the bill and will not permit me to return. I am not making objection to this, but it seems strange that they can return and offer amendments whereas I can not.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state to the gentleman that this is for the purpose of perfecting the bill.

Mr. IGOE. So is mine; to make the bill better.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, in explanation of the amendment I offered I desire to say this, that instead of the paragraph beginning on line 20, page 37, which was stricken out on a point of order, the committee adopted an amendment containing two provisos. The last, being the one I desire to have stricken out, is in these words:

Provided further, That no part of the sum appropriated by this paragraph shall be paid to attorneys.

That is the proviso I propose to have stricken out, because following that the committee adopted this proviso, which appeared to the committee at the time to better cover the purpose intended:

And provided further, That the money paid to the enrolled members as provided herein shall be exempt from any lien or attorneys' fees or other debt contracted prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is not the gentleman wrong as to the page; should it not be page 38 of the bill?

Mr. NORTON. It may be on page 37 or on page 38. The amendment I offer is to strike out a portion of the amendment adopted by the committee in place of the paragraph beginning on page 37, line 20, which went out on a point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. NORTON. Will the Clerk report the amendment again?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from North Dakota offers an amendment to a paragraph that was stricken out. Is this correct, or was a new paragraph inserted in its place?

Mr. NORTON. A new paragraph was inserted in its place, and I have offered an amendment to this.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I reserve the right to object to returning to this part of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. My amendment is offered simply to correct the language in the paragraph. As it now stands, there is a duplication of language in the two last provisos.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there is a duplication there, which is rather a reflection upon the committee which agreed to it; that is all.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will not object to return for that purpose, but I reserve the right to object for any other.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, that is all I desire. I desire to return to the paragraph for the purpose of offering this particular amendment and for no other purpose.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the Clerk report it again?

Mr. MANN. The last language in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma is "that no part of the money should be paid for attorneys' fees," and afterwards we adopted another amendment, and it is the last part of the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma that the gentleman wants to strike out.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The part of the amendment to which the gentleman refers which I offered was not subject to the point of order.

Mr. MANN. It was held not subject to the point of order.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That is it, and then, after the amendment was not objected to, when inserted afterwards we had passed the paragraph and could not move to strike out.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think this change is going to bring up the same discussion on that paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Ask the Clerk to read the last two provisos.

Mr. NORTON. I have not the matter before me, because it has not been printed since we passed it in committee.

Mr. MANN. Let the Clerk read the last two provisos.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That in cases where such enrolled members, or their heirs, are Indians who by reason of their degree of Indian blood belong to the restricted class, the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, withhold such payments and use the same for the benefit of such restricted Indians.

Mr. MANN. That is not it. Read the last clause of the amendment.

Mr. NORTON. If the Clerk will report my amendment, I think it specifies exactly.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Report the amendment as proposed by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That no part of the sum appropriated by this paragraph shall be paid to attorneys.

Provided further, That the money paid to the enrolled members as provided herein shall be exempt from any lien for attorneys' fees or other debt contracted prior to the passage of this act.

The CLERK. The amendment offered by Mr. NORTON proposes to strike out the first proviso just read, which is as follows:

Provided further, That no part of the sums appropriated by this paragraph shall be paid to attorneys.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have no objection to that. I think it is better language than the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 20, line 15.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I object to that. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill favorably to the House.

Mr. RAKER. I want to ask unanimous consent to let the amendment be reported.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects. The gentleman moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. IGOE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10385, the Indian appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PRISON LABOR.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a short editorial from the Pittsburgh Dispatch of January 29, 1916, at the request of Col. Rook, editor of that paper, on the prison-labor problem.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an editorial of January 29 from the Pittsburgh Dispatch. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Following is the editorial referred to:

PRISON-LABOR PROBLEM.

Five bills have been introduced in Congress seeking to abolish the interchange of prison-made goods between States. On their surface they seem well intentioned, but further consideration of the results of their enactment shows that the public effects would be most undesirable.

Too often in such discussion the infinitesimal output of prison labor is magnified out of all proportion, while the cost to the State of maintaining prisoners in idleness, both in money and in moral effect, is scarcely thought of. Flatly the question comes to this: The prisoners must have something to do. State-controlled institutions can not take enough of the products to keep the prisoners busy. The Pennsylvania law already prohibits the sale of the products either outside the State, as these bills in Congress do, or to any buyers within the State other than State institutions. Without an outlet for their labor the prisoners must be locked up in their cells in solitary confinement, which leads to insanity in time. Is the State to support these prisoners in idleness and turn them out worse than they entered or is it better to give them employment and turn them out better fitted to make their way in the world? Idleness and mischief have been traditionally associated, just as work is known to be a reforming influence.

Much could be done if the schools, hospitals, and institutions not controlled by the State and counties could supply their needs from the Prison Labor Association, which is doing its utmost to find a solution for the problem. As it is, prisoners are condemned to enforced idleness a large portion of their time, to the greater burdening of the taxpayers and the moral and physical detriment of the inmates, not to speak of the eventual cost to the community of dealing with hardened offenders who, by humane and judicious treatment, might have been made useful citizens.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10484, the Post Office appropriation bill. And pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that eight hours be granted to a side for general debate, and that it be divided between the chairman of the committee and the ranking member on the other side, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10484, and pending that motion, the gentleman asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 16 hours, 8 hours to be controlled by himself and 8 hours by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON]. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee as to the time for general debate? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10484) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, with Mr. RAINEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10484) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I suppose that then we will go ahead with general debate this evening?

Mr. MOON. I rather think we had better do so; yes.

Mr. MANN. Very well. To run until about 5 o'clock, I suppose?

Mr. MOON. Well, yes; we ought to adjourn by that time. We can not tell, though. It may be a little bit longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee to dispense with the first reading of the bill?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is recognized.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to confine myself in this general discussion as briefly as possible to the features of the bill.

We all realize the importance of the Post Office Department of this Government, and its close touch with the American people, and the necessity, I hope, for that consideration on the part of this House that will bring about the most efficient service in the department, and for that latitude of discretion in executive officers that is essential to that purpose.

The report sets forth the facts as to the appropriations in this bill, and I will ask that it be made an appendix to the remarks that I may make. In order that the House, however, may understand the scope of this legislation, I will read the following from the report:

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, in presenting this bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, submits the following:

The appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, was $313,364,667. The estimates of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, amount to $316,364,879. The committee recommends appropriations to the amount of $320,509,879.

The body of the report states the items contained in the bill and the jurisdiction of the various officers over those items, and it also sets forth in detail the amounts appropriated each year for each specific purpose; so that I deem it unnecessary that I should go at this time into details of the features of the appropriation.

It will be observed, however, that the estimates by the department for the service are probably $4,500,000 less than the amount which this committee has recommended. That is due to certain decreases and increases, and they are very few in this bill, for the estimates have been very close. The increase is especially due to the fact that the committee did not approve a suggestion of the Postmaster General, appropriating $48,500,000 for the Rural Delivery Service. The bill for the last fiscal year carried $53,000,000 for that purpose. The committee felt that that service ought to be perfected and extended, and therefore that the appropriation ought to be ample, and they restored to the bill the amount in the previous appropriation.

There are a vast number of minor amendments in the body of this bill, perfecting the legislation that has heretofore been had in the interest of the administrative features of the department. The suggestions of the department in part as to various features of legislation will be appended. There is but little increase in the way of salaries, the increase in the bill being due to the normal increase in the service and to the item especially on rural delivery heretofore mentioned. But we felt that so far as the laborers connected with the Post Office Department were concerned, there ought to be an increase in their wages. We have now 1,800 laborers. Nine hundred of them receive $720 each per annum. Nine hundred receive $840 each per annum. The committee has reported an item, "1,800 laborers, at $840 each." In other words, we have increased the salaries of 900 of them from $720 to $840. This is just about as little money as a man can live on decently in our country in these times.

The question of village experimental delivery has been before this House on various occasions heretofore.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What was that increase to of $840?

Mr. MOON. Laborers in the Post Office Department.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does that include janitors?

Mr. MOON. Yes, sir. And I might mention, in that connection, a slight increase that I omitted to mention, that in the wages of some printers connected with the department. We felt it wise to take care of this laboring force a little better than it has been taken care of before.

But to return to the suggestion I made: The committee is satisfied that there has been sufficient experiment in the village-delivery service. The sum of $200,000 has been appropriated heretofore for several sessions for experiments. The experiments have proven not only very successful but very beneficial to the villages. They have brought about an improvement in the lighting of the towns and an improvement in the pavements and sidewalks, and better conditions generally; and the committee now have an amendment striking out the word "experimental," so as to make this service a continuous service, like any other service connected with the department. We have not, however, for this fiscal year raised the amount beyond $200,000.

There are also a number of amendments to this bill which were heretofore passed by Congress, amending the law on the subject of depredations and robberies and granting to the railroad companies an increase of pay, or, rather, an adjustment of the basis on which the pay could be made in the Ohio Valley and other sections where, by reason of the great floods, the mails were diverted out of their ordinary course. The provision affords a foundation upon which this pay can be based and the general weight that can be taken at normal periods and used in determining the normal factor of the pay of the roads during the period of floods. The House has already passed on that question heretofore. That measure has been passed in a previous bill, in the bill to which the Senate failed to give final action in the last Congress because of the fact that it was not reached on the conference report until the closing hours of the session, when they did not have time to consider it.

Now, I will not review all of those amendments. They are set forth very fully, and in the reports you will find the reasons of the Postmaster General for the amendments suggested.

We have also made provision in this bill by which there can be no difference between the carriers and collectors as to compensation in the City Delivery Service.

The two features of this bill that will challenge the attention and the consideration of this House, in my judgment, those in which you will be most interested, are the railway mail pay section and the bonding section. The railway mail pay section has heretofore been passed by this body in a form a little different from that now presented to you and concurred in by the conference committee of the House and the Senate at the last session. The other is the section of the bill that provides for the bonding, by the Government of the United States, of the officers of the department and of the contractors for the screen-wagon service and the service on star routes. I call your attention to the language of that bill. I read:

SEC. 2. That hereafter the Postmaster General shall have authority and he is hereby empowered to assess and collect a sum of money, or fee, not in excess of 75 per cent of the present rates of bonds now in force, from each officer and employee of the Postal Service with the United States of America through the Post Office Department who are now, or hereafter may be, required by law to give bond, and to create and establish with the money or moneys derived from such assessments and collections a guaranty fund to indemnify the United States of America for losses incurred because of, or by reason of, the failure of any of the said officers or employees to faithfully perform and discharge, or for improperly performing and discharging, the duties and obligations imposed on the said officers or employees by reason of their acceptance of such office or employment, and a sum of money or fee not in excess of the rates of bonds now in force from each contractor with the United States of America through the Post Office Department who are now, or hereafter may be, required by law to give bond by reason of their acceptance or execution of such contract.

And the Postmaster General is further authorized and empowered to prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to create and maintain a guaranty fund and to pay in full from such guaranty fund any person or persons who have incurred or suffered loss or losses for which the United States is liable: Provided, That any officer or employee may give bond, with surety or sureties approved by the Postmaster General, in lieu of and in the place of an assessment for or contribution to the said guaranty fund: Provided further, That the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, require and secure a bond for the faithful and proper performance and discharge of the duties and obligations of any office or employment in addition to the assessment for and contribution to the said guaranty fund: And provided further, That the premium of such bond shall be charged against and paid from the said guaranty fund: And provided further, That the establishment and operation of said system shall be without additional cost to the Government.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. Under the proviso, if an employee of the department gives bond there will be no assessment collected from him.

Mr. MOON. None at all if he gives bond. I will desist from the further reading of that section.

The cost to the employee is 75 per cent of the amount that he would be required by the indemnity companies to pay if he gives them as bondsmen.

Now, there is a great deal connected with this question, more than would appear in the beginning. I can not conceive why there should be any opposition to the Government of the United States establishing a system by which it can bond its own officers for less than indemnity companies charge, and a system by which it can secure a fund, holding the indemnity in its own hands for its own protection against losses—I say, I can not conceive why there should be any opposition to this, unless selfish motives lie at the bottom of that opposition.

You may ask me why it is that this Government now proposes to enter upon a system of that kind. In the light of this proof it is well that I be frank with you and state to you the controlling motive and purpose of the Government in asking this legislation.

These bonds have been furnished in the contract service, and the fidelity bonds for the employees have been furnished by the companies in the United States that are engaged in that line of business. They have an attorney who spends the most of his time in the Post Office Department looking into conditions there, obtaining information that the Government alone ought to have in caring for its private business. He represents a large number of these companies. The proof is that a large number of them have been in combination for the purpose of raising the price, on contracts to be performed under the law in the screen-wagon service and in the star-route service, above the point that is legitimate and proper for this Government to pay. An investigation was had. Two of the most capable inspectors in the Post Office Department were detailed to ascertain the facts and the cause of the interruption and the interference of the bonding companies with the business of the Government in making its contracts. It was found that the attorneys representing the various companies that were in collusion would give the information in reference to the conditions existing in the department and would give advice as to the amount of the bid. In the city of San Francisco a bidder was willing to take a contract for $44,000——

Mr. COX. For $41,000.

Mr. MOON. I thank the gentleman. The bonding companies refused to bond him to the Government if he took the contract at that sum, but said to him, "We will bond you if your bid is $64,000." Well, it appeared that there was no competition to bring down the bid. The Government ascertained these facts and attempted to protect itself against the loss, and did so in a measure in that case. The loss to the Government would have been $20,000 upon that one contract. As a matter of fact, by reason of the failure of the bonding company to execute the bond for the contractor at the lower figure, the Government did lose about $14,000.

I have not the time to read all these cases and the facts to you, but if you will look on pages 144 to 147 of the hearings before the Post Office Committee upon this bill, you will find a most interesting state of facts. You will find there the statement of the necessity for the passage of this law for the protection of the Government from frauds of this sort. Why, these things run into the hundreds of thousands of dollars. It must be apparent to you that something ought to be done to protect the Government in some way.

It is said that the Government is going into a private business and therefore that this is a wrong policy. Can it be said that the Government is in error when it goes into the printing business for the purpose of printing documents for its own use? Is this great printing establishment down here the result of an erroneous piece of legislation? If the Government should go out and advertise for bids for printing outside of that establishment it would be subject to the objection, if it be an objection, that the Government was going into private business. Is it private business for the Government to establish its munition plants? Is it private business for the Government to have this great Engraving Bureau in this city? These are the necessary adjuncts of a great business department. It is not entering into private business, it is not contesting with bonding companies for the Government to see to it that its employees are not imposed upon and that it is not imposed upon in the execution of contracts covering this public service.

But they say you can not do that. The answer is that it has been done. In Canada it was done, and after 15 years the surplus was so great there that it was absolutely unnecessary to make a bond at all.

They say, further, that these bonding companies have complied with their contracts and that there has been no loss to the Government under the old system. The answer in the record, in cases stated by the department, shows that to be utterly false. There are hundreds of thousands of dollars that this Government can not collect on indemnity bonds.

Mr. Chairman, there has been much discussion and feeling about this question, but it can be very clear that there can be and is no opposition to it except from selfish motives. Briefly stated, the position of the department in offering this legislation is that such action will result in material saving of money which is now paid in premiums to surety companies.

Second. It will stimulate bidding and competition and restore confidence in the minds of the public.

Third. It will prevent collusion among bidders and unwarranted and unfair action by surety companies and their agents.

Fourth. It will enable the department to handle and keep within its control confidential information which is now furnished to surety companies by bidders long before it reaches the department, as well as to decide for itself whether or not a competitor is competent or qualified to perform service on proposals submitted by him.

Fifth. It will prevent the restriction and dictation of the amount of bids, such as has been referred to in this report.

They therefore recommend that the present system of bonding of star-route, screen-wagon, and other contracts be abolished, and in lieu thereof that a law be enacted containing such provisions as may be deemed necessary in order to have such contracts in the future bonded by the Government.

These companies have appeared in the hearings, not only before the Post Office Committee but before the Committee on Rules, before which is pending an application for a rule on this question. One gentleman in the most pleasant suave manner possible states with adroit ability every fact that stands in support of his proposition, but none in support of the other proposition. Another gentleman becomes violent and indignant whenever the suggestion is made that fraud has been practiced, not by his company, but by some of the companies in collusion, as shown in this report. Yet there stands before this House and before these two committees the unquestioned and positive proof of a combination between some of these companies to defraud the Government of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has stated one instance where one bonding company of San Francisco for some reason refused to bond its screened-wagon contractor unless he would increase the amount of his bid. Were there any other instances of a similar nature called to the attention of the committee?

Mr. MOON. Yes; there are a number of instances where it has occurred. I read from the statement of Mr. Cortelyou:

In the New York case the Monahan Express Co. had submitted a bid of $500,000 through the National Surety Co., of New York. The National was not able to write the full amount of the bond and applied to the American to act as coinsurer. Mr. Monahan, at the time he submitted a bid, intended to submit a bid at $500,000, but he was under the impression that he would have to pay the ferriage charges between New York and New Jersey. Later he learned that the Government would assume those charges and he decided to reduce his bid to $450,000. At the time he made his application for a bond of $500,000 he submitted indemnity to cover the entire contract, which appeared to be satisfactory to both surety companies. He claims that he was not permitted to reduce his bid to $450,000, but was permitted to reduce it to $498,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the reason for that was——

Mr. MOON. I am going to state the reason, if the gentleman will not interrupt me. The bonding companies said they have insisted on the higher bids for the reason that it furnished a better indemnity, that they were better protected; but we are not as much interested in that as we are in the protection of the Government. We can secure the protection and indemnity at a less figure. Now, the American Surety Co. and others interested in this matter have brought about, if I may use the mildest term, the disarrangement of the business of the Government with the contractors by interference of this character, which has cost the Government a large sum of money.

It is shown that one Cassidy had contracts in cities of the United States under which he pressed up the contention that the companies should put in higher bids, and so far did Cassidy interfere with making contracts and conspiring with others against the Government along these lines to defraud it, that he and three other men who were interested with him were indicted in the Federal court in the State of New York, tried and convicted, and sent to the penitentiary at Atlanta, and are now serving in that prison.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give some information as to the number of concrete instances where these practices were indulged in?

Mr. MOON. There is the record, I have read you three of them. There are a number of others. I do not want to take up my time by reading them.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not wishing to take up the gentleman's time, but I thought that perhaps he might give the total number of concrete cases.

Mr. MOON. I can not tell the total number. The Government reports that are here show the number of instances, but if there was only one, it would demonstrate to this House the necessity of closing the door to that class of fraud and the adoption of a policy that would enable the Government to protect itself against any such condition.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigar. Does it appear that this class of business is undesirable to the bonding company? That seemed to crop out before a committee of which I am a member. They did not care to bond public building contractors.

Mr. MOON. The facts show that on Fidelity bonds, where they charge a dollar for each thousand, the loss if paid in full, which would not be the case, would be 26 cents on every dollar received. In other words, there is a profit of 74 per cent on each thousand dollars of the bond less legitimate charges to the bonding company in every little bond. Now, if the bonding company with their expense can make a net profit of 3 to 1, can not the Government give a reduction of 25 per cent and establish a fund of 2 to 1 to protect it. In a number of large contracts running over a period of four years the bonds are $5,000 to $7,000. Vast sums of money are involved in this. Of course it is natural that the bonding companies shall do as they have done; it is natural that they should take a position that will prevent the Government from protecting itself by a fund created in this way if they profit thereby. But I insist that whatever interest the bonding company may have in a question that so closely affects the Government of the United States, it is the duty of Congress to take an interest in the protection of the people of the United States against such actions upon the part of the bonding companies, and it is not entering into private business to do so but in the business of protecting ourselves.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. If this provision, as written in the bill, should become a law, there will be collected from employees only 75 per cent of what they are now paying.

Mr. MOON. That is correct.

Mr. GARRETT. And so the employees would not be hurt in any way?

Mr. MOON. They could not. They would be benefited 25 per cent.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. OGLESBY. The gentleman may have answered my question when I was called out of the Hall; but are not these bonding companies secured in some way by the contractors whose bonds they sign?

Mr. MOON. They are often protected by the contractors from loss, and they have a system of protecting each other and sharing the profits, as I understand it.

Mr. OGLESBY. These contractors who furnish protection to the bonding companies by going on the bonds could furnish the same protection to the company established by the Government for that purpose.

Mr. MOON. Oh, yes; the Government will have the fund in its hands. This matter has all been solved in the Canadian Government, and the feasibility of it is fully demonstrated. If it had not been done, if no experiment had ever been made, we would be derelict in our duty in the face of the fact that these bonding companies go right into the office of the Government and force a contract of $20,000 on a $40,000 proposition above the legitimate and proper compensation that the contractor should have for the service.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Do all of the bonding companies charge the same price for a bond; and if they do not, how are you going to arrive at the amount?

Mr. MOON. I suppose they do charge the same amount. There may be a few that do not, but practically all do.

Mr. TILSON. Suppose some company should cut its rate and go down below the others?

Mr. MOON. Of course that would cut the rate of compensation.

Mr. TILSON. It would cut the guaranty bond down.

Mr. MOON. But when they have as good a thing as this there is no cut rate in the proposition.

But, Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to dwell so long upon a simple proposition of this sort. It is clear that if we want to aid the Government that none of these specious pleas in objection will be permitted to influence us, and if we want to sanction the possibility of such fraud as this we can decline its enactment.

The more important question before this House is the question of railway mail pay. That question has been with us a long time. It ought now to be settled. There have been many hearings upon the question. They began after the passage of the act of 1873, first, and in 1876, and then there were other hearings up to 1897, which changed but slightly the enactment of 1873 for railway mail pay. There have been reports by commissions appointed by this House, I believe, three times upon that question. Months and years have been spent in the hearings. The committees have heard the railroads and the hearings have been complete. They have been full. Every fact that could be developed before these commissions by experts was brought out. Expert statisticians have passed upon the question, and now, in my humble judgment, the time has come when the question should be settled. I take it that no just man has any desire to do injustice to the railroad companies. I believe none of us entertains, or has the right to entertain, any prejudice against those great corporations, which have been, whatever charges may have been brought against them or may be, the principal factors in the development of our commerce and the material and social interest of the American people.

So it is rather with a feeling of friendship and of liberality that we approach the consideration of a question like this, not that we want any injustice done them, because we want ample justice done them, but because we want to save our country from the injustice of a law under which we are now operating. Before going into the discussion of those material facts which are essential always in every case to be thoroughly established before a sound judgment can be given on the proposition, it may be well that we review some of the incidental or collateral facts as throwing some light upon the status of this question. There is to-day, as appears from the hearings, an agreement, a combination, solemnly entered into by the railroads of the United States, the great trunk lines and the little short lines, for the purpose of maintaining the present law, for the prevention of a law by which we go from the present method of compensation of pay upon weights to one for compensation for space. They are to a man arraigned against the policy. They have the greatest lobby to-day at work ever known to the American people. Since a similar bill was passed in the House of Representatives and did not pass the Senate, although concurred in by the Senate conference committee, for the reasons heretofore stated, there never was such a propaganda promulgated among a civilized people against the Government as these railroads have carried on against this measure. First, a falsification of every fact that is material for consideration. All through the summer an abuse of the Postmaster General and of the committee that had this matter in charge. And what have they done?

They have presented not one single fact in justification of the charge that this law ought not to be changed, not a single one. They have gone to the newspapers; they have gone to all the commercial bodies of this country, and they have a stereotyped set of resolutions denouncing this measure as unfair and unjust to the railroad companies and a request that the whole question be submitted for adjudication to the Interstate Commerce Commission. That has been their position for the last 12 months. Not only to delay—a delay that has already run since 1876 to this time—but they would further extend that delay by the abrogation of the power and the authority of the Congress over this question and its concession to the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is their attitude. And every one of these commercial bodies—and they contain our most intelligent citiezns, too—have all along sanctioned the application of some railroad attorney or some of the friends of the railroads for these resolutions, denouncing the action of Congress two years ago and denouncing this bill now. Look at them. Is a resolution of any value that states no fact upon which its conclusion is based? Is a mere charge that the railroads are earning insufficient money and ought to have more pay sufficient to establish the fact that this Government is not giving just compensation for the carrying of these mails? This much, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of removing the underbrush in this case that we may get down to the facts and ascertain the truth, for the truth, its power to sustain, can on no dubious fact lean. Now, let us see if we are right or if we are wrong. If we are wrong, let us recede, and too quickly it can not be done. If we are right, let us press this measure to its conclusion in behalf of decency and national honor. What is the law? You can not tell whether a law should be repealed or altered or in any way amended until you first know the law. You can not tell whether the amendment proposed is just until the policy upon which it is based is discussed in connection with the existing law. And what is the existing law on the subject of railway mail pay. I shall not undertake to give you the figures, though they lie on the table here before me.

Under the law to-day compensation for railway mail pay is ascertained by a quadrennial weighing of the mails. In other words, the United States is divided into four sections, and in one of those sections each year the mail is weighed, and upon the weight there ascertained for 100 days' weighing, the weight for the whole four years is fixed in that division. Now, is that a fair method of ascertaining, to begin with? What may be done—I do not say what can be done or what has been done, although it has been frequently charged, but what may be done? Mails may be diverted from the section in which there is no weighing into a section where there is weighing. and the basis fixed upon a false weight made in that way, and if there were no fraud it must be clear to every intelligent man that there is a constant and continued diversion of mails on all competitive lines, and that one line may carry the mail for three-fourths of the year, and two other lines have a credit equal with it for the amount of mail carried during that period where each has a contract to carry. Therefore injustice must operate either to one or two or three lines or to the Government in the settlement of that question, if the facts could be ascertained upon which to settle it. It is too unwise and unscientific and indefinite and inaccurate a method of computing the mail weight and pay. I asked Postmaster General Cortelyou once, and I have asked others since, if upon the method under the act of 1873 of computng the pay for railway carriage of mail it would be possible for his department by any method of calculation to come within $15,000,000 per annum of the amount that ought to be paid for the transportation of mails, and invariably the answer has been that it can not be done. It is impossible of demonstration, but the railroads say, "Expend another million dollars every year to weigh them annually and then we will have better results." It is, however, conceded that the results would be possibly more accurate; yet, on account of legal or illegal diversion of the mails the results must continue wholly indefinite. It is at best only a guess for 4 years' pay on 100 days' weighing. What other feature is there connected with this? Under the present law the railway companies that carry a full R. P. O. car, a rolling post-office car, in which the Government distributes through its agents the mails, and a storage car in which the mail is carried simply in bulk, the railway companies not only have pay for every pound of that unhandled mail at the high, exorbitant figure they now have—a figure which Mr. Hitchcock's administration said plundered this Government of $11,000,000 annually—they not only have the benefit of that pay, but they have the benefit of the pay for the receptacle in which that mail is carried.

For each of those cars, which cost from $5,000 to $11,000 apiece, dependent upon whether they are wood or steel superstructure or whole steel, is paid for at the annual rental of about $5,000 in a year in addition to the weight that it carries. And the testimony before this committee is that there is a net profit on that $5,000 of $3,750, after the hauling of the cars and the paying for the fires and the water and lights, per annum. Of course the long-line railroads in the United States are unwilling to abandon the project by which they get twice as much as they ought to have for carrying the mail by weight and, in addition, get the pay for these cars, about 1,500 of which, I believe, are in use to-day in the United States. These are the facts, and the law on that side of the case in favor of the existing statute, or against it, as in your judgment you may conclude. But the railroad companies say, "We perform another service which ought to be considered, namely, the side-line service. You require us to deliver the mail within 80 rods of the railroad when there is a post office within 80 rods of the railroad." We do. But that charge is included and involved in the compensation fixed for the weight carried in the cars.

Now, here come other petitioners, agents of the railroads of the United States, backing their masters in this contention, and protest against this law. But, unfortunately, they make one statement. They say, "We are not paid by the railroads for this service." An examination of the railroad people shows that but very few of them are paid. It is unfortunate for these men, but the railroads are paid and they are demanding a credit actually for services performed by employees whom they do not pay for that service, as they insist.

Look at the other side of this question a moment. So unsatisfactory has been this law that since its existence the abnormal growth of the pay has been wonderful. Our country has progressed; railroad transportation has largely increased. The first carriage under the present act cost the Government seven million and odd dollars. To-day it is $60,000,000. Can you justify a system that will give you an increase of $1,000,000 to $2,000,000 yearly, by reason of its very indefiniteness, above that which is normal?

But I will not further digress but go back and state the case of the Government to-day in its position on this question. There has been no uncertainty in fixing the space basis which we now contend for. There has been no indefiniteness in fixing the car rates or the terminal charges. We are not standing here with a broad declaration, with no fact behind it, that the railroads are not consistent. What has our commissions done? What have they concluded? We put in this bill as compensation for the railroad companies on the space basis the highest figure ever suggested by any commission upon this question. How did we reach this conclusion? We are giving rates here of 21 cents for each mile a car is hauled for the whole space that is in it, 11 cents where one-half of the car is taken, and 6 cents where one-fourth of it is taken. Now, how is that arrived at? Through the aid and instrumentality of the Interstate Commerce Commission, through the statisticians of the Post Office Department, an estimate of the right of way of the railroads in the United States, of the trackage of the roads, the cost of construction, the cost of the rolling stock, the cost of operation, the amount of the bonds involved, the amount of mortgage, the interest carried, the value of overhead and operating charges—all brought into consideration in determining this question, in passing from the weight to the space basis. What was the result of it all? The result was these figures that we fix in this bill. There has been no uncertainty about it.

Well, they say, "How do you know after all that is done it is certain the position you have taken is correct?" We can only answer that upon all of those calculations the Interstate Commerce Commission and the postal commission concluded that 23.4 cents per mile, or about that sum, for the hauling of a full car for passengers was compensation. Now, we reduced that 10 per cent, and add initial and terminal charges, because the hauling of mail is not as expensive as the hauling of passengers in this, that there is no risk incurred in the hauling of their mails; there are no operators to be paid for by the railroads in the handling of the mails, as there is in the handling and hauling of passengers. They insist that that is a legitimate reduction of the passenger rate and that that ought to be the rate that is paid. Some of the commissions have thought that the rate should be less, but we do not want to be unfair to the railroads. We want to be just to them. We fixed the highest rate that any commission—charged with the examination of this question—has ever suggested. We fixed the highest railroad initial and terminal charges.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not wish to break the continuity of the gentleman's argument, but at some place where it would be convenient I would like to ask him about the short-line railroads.

Mr. MOON. I am going to talk about the short-line road rates.

Now, this is the basis of compensation that is proposed: Let us see; that is, taking it in detail; that is, reaching the conclusion by a comparison between the passenger and mail rates. Let us see what effect that has upon the measure before the House. Under the bill that is before you, the railroad companies will, in round figures, receive about $60,000,000 for carrying the mail during the next fiscal year under the weight, or the old system.

What are they getting under the proposition that we propose to you in this bill to pass from the weight to the space system? Nearly $64,000,000. Is it possible that they could complain when we are giving them now, under the provisions of the new bill, nearly $4,000,000 more than they have ever gotten under any bill? That is a demonstration of the fact that there is no injustice done the railroads. What more are we doing? How about these short-line railroads, that are under the dominion and control of these great trunk lines, that do not get paid for any space, under the present law, in the car, though the Government uses a part of the space and does not pay them for it, because they are said to be paid sufficiently by weight, notwithstanding the great trunk lines get paid in full for cars aside from the weight? What do we say to those little roads that will make frequent trips per day under the new law, the Government paying for space contracted for, going and coming, whether the car is loaded or not loaded, the Government paying for the whole space? To answer in the inverse order, Where you are making such frequent trips as to earn more than you are entitled to, we will limit the number of your trips through Executive order under the contract so as to give you just compensation.

But they say the vast number of these roads throughout the country, those west of the Rocky Mountains particularly, make only one trip per day; they can not make more, and they are inadequately paid, because they get nothing for the space, and get paid only for the weight, and the weight is such as not to compensate them. We answer that that is true. You ought to have relief. But the law must be made for the general average. You can not, where there are thousands of railroads, make a separate law for each one. The law must be made to cover the whole. If we do justice to the average in fixing the maximum rate, we have done justice as far as legislation can go, so far as rate fixing is concerned. But we say to these little roads in this bill, and to the large ones, "If the compensation that is accorded you by this measure is not complete and adequate, then you have the right to go to the Postmaster General and make a special contract with him for a higher rate than that which is in this bill, so that you shall have compensation."

But that is not all. We say, "If the Government, with its plenary power under this bill, does not give you justice, then file your complaint, as you have been insisting you desired to do for years; file your complaint with the Interstate Commerce Commission; require the Government to produce its facts, and you do the same and let that tribunal determine what the rate shall be."

Is not that a fair proposition? And we confer, by this bill, jurisdiction upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to deal with this question as it does with the question of rates everywhere. Is that unfair to them? I think not.

They insisted for a long time that that should be done, but now they say, "You should abrogate your power to fix the maximum rate; you should place the whole question without consideration on your part into the Interstate Commerce Commission, and let them settle it." They know that means long delay and further profits.

Now, there is no phase—and I challenge any man to present it—of this question under which these roads are not fairly dealt with and are not getting full compensation and remuneration for the full service. Let me review for just a little the facts. When we get right close down to the bottom of this question—I have been coming down to it as gradually as I could and trying to demonstrate to you the truth of the position we have taken and the error of the law that exists—we will find the true cause of opposition to this bill. It is contained in the hearings, the record in the case.

There is Mr. Ralph Peters, the president of the Railway Mail Association of the United States, that includes nearly every road in this country—even the little short lines that can not help themselves, which are impressed into a fight against the Government on this question under a bill which gives them relief—whose testimony we will examine. What does he say? We ask Mr. Peters, in substance, "Are your roads not in a combination to prevent the adoption of the space basis?" "Not in a combination," I will say, "but we have an association for that purpose, and we bitterly oppose the space basis." We say, in substance, "Mr. Peters, if we change from the weight basis to the space basis and give you the highest figure ever yet recommended by a commission for car movement on space rates, and also the highest figure for initial and terminal charge, and then give you the right to contract with the Government for a still higher rate, if that does not suit you; and then give you the right, if that does not suit you, of appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a rate; and, if that does not suit you, you can exercise your power under the Constitution to refuse to carry these mails because, you say, the rate is confiscatory—and you can not be made, it is true, under the Constitution to carry them if the rates are confiscatory—under all these advantages, Mr. Peters, would you object to going from the weight basis to the space basis?"

I would most emphatically object. We would not agree to the space basis under any circumstances.

Then, Mr. Peters, is not this the point of the whole thing: That under the space rate, for which you are to be paid full and adequate compensation, whether the space is occupied or not, that the Government may load those cars with its parcel post and other matter and in a measure recoup and maintain annually the same rate on the railroads, except where they add additional burdens by demanding additional space?

The answer is, Absolutely; yes.

Read that record. I asked every man who came upon the stand a similar question. I asked even a man who said that his road, a little Tennessee and western North Carolina road, would be paid under the new basis two or three times what it is now getting, and he, too, said he would never take the space basis, although paid two or three times as much as under the old law. Why? He did not want any interference, by low rates on the parcel post, with express and freight.

Gentlemen, that is all there is in this question. Under the low rates to the people in the first and second zones the parcel post in those zones is barely paying, if at all. You can make that the great profit business of your whole department if you will have the courage to pass a law that will protect the people of the United States against the combinations and depredations of public carriers. If we pay, as I have demonstrated to you that we do pay, full and adequate compensation for the space we use, why shall the railroad companies say that we may not have the benefit of that which we have purchased? They have no right to demand more than full and adequate compensation for that which they give us.

But, you may ask me, if it is costing more by three or four million dollars, in the first place, to go to the space basis than to remain on the weight basis, why should we make the change? My answer is that under the weight basis, by the manipulations and the changing of the mails and the conditions and the deflection of mails, the railway mail pay is gradually increased from year to year from $2,000,000 to $3,000,000, as it has been in a number of years past. But my more reasonable answer to you is that it is because of the benefits which would come to the people. Your department can handle the cars in which they pay for the space and can so adjust the loading and the unloading and the transportation as to recoup within a year or two every dollar that is lost by this change in the basis of compensation from weight to space.

Then it makes it fixed and definite and absolutely certain. Your Postmaster General will not have to answer the committee that he can not come within $15,000,000 per annum of the legitimate pay, but he can tell your committee what the pay is for transportation of the mails in the United States at the end of each month.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand that there is a uniform agreement, or an adjustment, to maintain prices for the carriage of the mails at the present time?

Mr. MOON. Among the railroads?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MOON. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is not that in violation of existing statutes?

Mr. MOON. I presume it may be, but I am not prosecuting them under that statute. I am trying to get our mail matter out of the hands and control of the railroads.

Now, as I was about to remark, the advantages come to us in that way. The department estimates that in a few years, by the control and ownership of this space, your parcel-post system can be extended and prices probably reduced in the first and second zones, and the benefits come to the people that ought to come from the transportation of this matter.

This is nothing but the covert fight of the express companies through the railroad companies, whose officials in some instances, I am informed, own the express companies, against the Government of the United States in its effort to establish and maintain a parcel post that will give lower rates to the people upon small packages when carried in the mails. It is a question of whether you will surrender your power, and whether you will defer relief to the people under the laws already passed for the parcel post, or whether you will submit to the dictation and judgment of these corporations. I say it in no offensive sense, because in many respects they are great and beneficent, but they exercise a part of the sovereign power of States. They are no mere individuals. They exercise the right of eminent domain. And, more than that, you can not demand from the Government compensation in your line of business. You must exercise your individual judgment, and rise or fall upon it.

These are more than extra individuals; and why do they have these powers? It is not to advance them in profit alone; they have that right and take that benefit; but it is to subserve the interests of a great people that has conferred these powers and this jurisdiction upon them. We ought to hold a strong hand over these powers that are greater than the individual; and while we should not, out of our own self-respect, do them any injustice, we ought to see to it that they do to our people no wrong. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, submitted the following report [to accompany H. R. 10484].

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, in presenting this bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, submits the following:

The appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, was $313,364,667. The estimates of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, amount to $316,364,879. The committee recommends appropriations to the amount of $320,509,879. The increase in the estimates of the department over the appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, is due to the normal growth of the service. The increase of recommendations by the committee over the estimates of the department is due largely to the fact that the committee was not content with the appropriation of $48,500,000 for the maintenance and extension of the Rural Delivery Service and increased the amount to $53,000,000, the same as carried in the appropriation for 1916. There were some other increases and decreases, which brought about the result as above stated.

The report of the Postmaster General sets forth fully the use of the money heretofore appropriated and the revenues to be expected and expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917.

The following tables show the appropriations for 1916, the estimates of the department for the year 1917, and the recommendations of the committee for 1917, in the office of the Postmaster General, and the First, Second, Third, and Fourth Assistant Postmasters General, and in them may be found the separate items of appropriations under the jurisdiction of each of these offices, and the total of all appropriations, estimates, and recommendations.

It is not regarded as necessary by the committee to enter into any discussion in this report of the new legislation presented in the bill, as it must be discussed in the House if a rule is made making it in order. Then, too, the hearings heretofore held in the consideration of this bill set forth fully and concisely the reasons for the legislation, and the reports of the department on the same are also printed in the hearings, which are available to each Member of the House. This legislation is familiar to a large majority of the Members of the House, having heretofore been enacted in its main features by the House, but failed to become a law by reason of the fact that the Senate did not reach it in time in the last session for its consideration.

RAILWAY MAIL PAY—AN OUTLINE OF THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT'S POSITION.

This booklet is issued by the Post Office Department in response to many requests from individuals, business men, publications, boards of trade, and Members of Congress for the facts relating to the proposed change in the method of adjusting railway mail pay.

It tells what the railway mail transportation service is, what the proposed law seeks to accomplish, and it shows why the space basis is preferable to the weight basis of computing pay, why public interest demands a prompt settlement of the question, why the new rates of pay proposed by the Post Office Department are just and reasonable; and it answers some of the many erroneous statements that have been circulated about this question.

THE WEIGHT BASIS—AN ANTIQUATED, COMPLEX, UNBUSINESSLIKE, INEQUITABLE SYSTEM.

The law now governing railway mail pay provides for pay on the basis of the average daily weights of mails carried over authorized routes. It dates back to 1873.

Maximum rates of pay are prescribed in the law. These are applicable to the average daily weights carried upon authorized mail routes ascertained by weighings held once every four years. On each route the mails are weighed for a period of 105 successive days. The rates are arranged on a sliding scale, whereby as the weights increase the rates decrease.

The country is divided into four contract sections, and the mails weighed successively in each section. That is to say, while a weighing occurs once in every four years on each particular route and in each contract section, a weighing occurs in one section each year. The average annual cost to the department for weighing the mails is $250,000.

In addition to the pay for weights, the present law authorizes additional pay for railway post-office cars, 40 feet and more in length, at specified rates. This constitutes partial recognition of the space principle as a proper factor in making mail transportation rates.

The plan of 1873 has never been changed, although the rates were somewhat reduced by Congress in 1876, 1878, and 1907.

The weighings are costly and annoying and interfere seriously with the operation of the service in the field. Compensation thus determined is not fairly distributed according to service rendered. The system lacks the elasticity to meet changing conditions and fluctuations of traffic that, with the growth of the parcel post, have been frequent and far-reaching.

Computation of pay under the old law with its several amendments is a complex process, little understood, and productive of endless and vexatious disputes.

The whole plan is unscientific, inequitable in results, and needlessly complex.

THE SPACE BASIS.

A SIMPLE, PRACTICAL, ACCURATE, JUST METHOD.

As far back as 1876 so much dissatisfaction with the weight system of determining railway mail pay existed that Congress provided for a commission, to be appointed by the President, to investigate the subject. A succession of inquiries by congressional commissions, by appointive commissions, and by the Post Office Department have followed.

Practically every such investigation, including that made by the joint committee of Congress which reported in 1914, resulted in the conclusion that the present system is inadequate, complex, cumbersome, and unbusinesslike, and in recommendations for the substitution either in whole or in part of the space basis for the weight basis.

HAULING A CAR 1 MILE MADE "UNIT OF SERVICE."

The space method now proposed by the Post Office Department adopts the "car-mile units of service" as the basis upon which to make authorizations of and payments for the major part of the railroad mail service. This would mean rates of pay—which have been ascertained after thorough inquiry to be fair rates—for hauling standard full railway post-office, apartment, and storage mail cars 1 mile.

The new plan contemplates additional compensation in the form of terminal allowances for services not covered by the space payment, representing charges for loading mails, and for heating, lighting, cleaning, and switching mail cars at the terminals of car runs, and provides for the retention of the weight basis for "closed-pouch service." The latter comprises a very small per centage of the mail traffic and requires so little space in trains and fluctuates in quantity to such an extent that the space system could not be easily adapted to it. By far the bulk of mail pay would be determined by the space-and-distance gauge.

DIFFERING RATES FOR VARIOUS TYPES OF CAR.

The standard mail car is 60 feet long, and is usually 9 feet wide and 8½ feet high, inside measurements. Only the length is to figure, however, in determining pay.

There are two kinds of full mail cars—railway post-office cars and mail-storage cars.

The former, as the name signifies, are traveling post offices in which the mail is "worked"—that is, opened, distributed, assembled in packages or bags for individual post offices, other railway routes, and for stations and carrier routes in large cities. When an entire car is thus utilized, it is called a "full railway post-office car."

The storage cars, as the name also implies, are traveling storehouses in which the mail is stored before and after being worked or for through carriage.

The railway post-office cars are equipped by the railroad companies, and must be heated and lighted while en route at the expense of the railroads. These expenses do not apply in the same degree to storage cars, which require only light and heat in a limited degree and provision for making stall separations. Hence, for R. P. O. car service, as it is called, a somewhat higher rate of pay should be allowed than for storage-car service. This is amply provided for in the scale of rates proposed.

APARTMENT CARS GET PROPORTIONATE RATES.

The volume of mail passing over the thousands of railway mail routes varies. On the heavy routes—New York to Chicago, New York to St. Louis, etc.—a number of full cars and storage cars are needed each trip. On other routes one full car, with or without a storage car, meets the need. On the majority of routes a half car or a quarter car suffices. To fit this condition a third class of railway mail car service is operated known as apartment-car service. This requires combination cars, used in part for mail and in part for baggage or other railway business. At present these are of various lengths, but the proposed law provides for two standard sizes, viz, 30 feet and 15 feet.

Under the space system apartment-car service would be paid for at a rate proportionate to the full-car rate; for a 30-foot apartment, one-half the full-car pay; for a 15-foot apartment, slightly more than one-fourth the full-car rate.

CLOSED-POUCH SERVICE RETAINS WEIGHT BASIS.

"Closed-pouch" service is the carriage of United States mail pouches locked or sealed containing letter and paper mail, or sacks containing paper mail only, transported over a route without breaking bulk. As performed by the railroads this service consists of the transportation of one, two, three, or more closed mail bags over routes or on trains upon which the mail traffic is not heavy enough to require special accommodations for distribution en route. These mails are in the custody of the baggageman, who receives and delivers them without the intervention of postal employees.

Manifestly, because of its fluctuating character and the fact that in many cases the mail involved consists of simply a pouch or sack, computation of pay for closed-pouch service on the space basis would be exceedingly difficult, hence the retention of the weight basis for this class of business. It is provided that the weighings of closed-pouch mails and readjustment of pay for their carriage shall be made annually instead of quadrennially as at present. The annual weighing, it is estimated, will cost the Post Offie Department about $100,000.

NEW PLAN FAILED LAST YEAR BY A NARROW MARGIN.

The desirability of a revision of the laws governing railway mail pay has been recognized by postal administrations for many years, but no definite proposition was presented to Congress until August, 1911, when the department reported the results of an exhaustive inquiry commenced in 1907, and submitted a tentative plan for revising the laws upon the basis of space, with rates based upon the cost of the service to the companies plus a reasonable rate of profit.

Subsequent study and further information obtained during the progress of the investigations of the joint congressional committee having demonstrated that the cost basis was impracticable under present conditions, the department changed its view and submitted a new plan essentially identical with the proposed law now advocated.

In June, 1914, this plan was presented by the chairman of the House Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, Hon. JOHN A. MOON. Hearings on this bill were had before the proper committees of Congress.

PASSED THE HOUSE TWICE; AGREED TO IN CONFERENCE.

Twice, by large majorities, the House, in August, 1914, and January, 1915, approved the plan proposed by the Post Office Department. This plan carried the essential features of the recommendation of the joint congressional committee for a change to the space basis, except that it provided for retaining the weight basis for closed-pouch service. The joint committee advocated the space basis for all service. The plan provided for a scale of pay exceedingly liberal in the light of every factor that justly enters into the question of fixing reasonable compensation for carrying the mails, and assured the railroads a somewhat larger revenue per car mile for carrying the mails than they are now receiving.

On the occasion of its first passage in the House, the mail-pay measure was incorporated, along with other needed postal legislation, in the Moon bill. Because of the congestion of legislation during the short session, it became apparent that the Moon bill could not be enacted, and, hence, the mail-pay section of the Moon bill was incorporated in the annual Post Office appropriation bill.

In essentials the department's plan was agreed to in the conference committee of House and Senate upon the appropriation, but a final vote upon the conference committee's report was not reached in the Senate.

NEW RATES COMPENSATE ALL CLASSES OF SERVICE.

Under the department bill the rates of railway mail pay are divided into two classes: (1) Car-mile line rates; (2) initial and terminal rates.

The former provide compensation for hauling the different sizes of standard mail cars and will constitute the bulk of the pay. The latter cover expenses of loading and unloading mails, switching, heating, lighting, and cleaning cars and other station expenses at the termini of the car runs.

This division of compensation into two parts, one of which provides special allowances for costs of terminal station service at points of origin and destination on all runs regardless of distance, for the first time allots pay with equitable recognition of long and short hauls. Initial and terminal costs vary little, whether the car run is 100 miles or 1,000 miles. The terminal allowances which are the same regardless of the length of car run will increase the pay per mile according to the length of run, the longer the trip the smaller the increase per mile.

Car-mile line rates.

Class.	Unit.	Car-mile rate.
Full R. P. O. cars	60-foot cars	$0.21
Apartment cars	30-foot apartment	.10½
Do	15-foot apartment	.05¼
Storage cars	60-foot cars	.20

Initial and terminal rates.

Class.	Unit.	Initial and terminal allowance per single trip.
Full R. P. O. cars	60-foot cars	$4.00
Apartment cars	30-foot cars	2.00
Do	15-foot cars	1.00
Storage cars	30-foot cars	4.00

PASSENGER REVENUE LESS 10 PER CENT IS BASIS OF RATES.

The car-mile line rates are based primarily upon the average car-mile revenue earned by the passenger service of the country as reported to the Interstate Commerce Commission, with a suitable reduction to offset the difference in character between passenger and mail services. Many considerations applying to the carriage of the mails do not apply to the carriage of passengers, and facilities furnished by the railroads for passenger service differ materially from facilities furnished for mail service.

There is no justification for the claim that the mail service should participate fully in the enormous costs of elaborate terminals and station structures. The mails neither seek nor need housing in $100,000,000 buildings; in fact, the least expensive parts of stations are devoted to the mails, and very rightly so.

The initial and terminal rates are based upon estimates of the initial and terminal costs—loading, unloading, switching, etc., as stated above.

THE NEW SCHEDULE IS RESULT OF LONG STUDY.

The determination of the rates was a most difficult problem. Numerous bases were suggested, considered, and rejected.

The conclusion was reached after long and thorough inquiry that a 10 per cent reduction would approximately represent the proper difference between the passenger-service revenue and an adequate mail revenue.

Applied to 25.43 cents, the passenger car-mile revenue for 1911 (the latest figure available at the time the rates were constructed), the 10 per cent reduction produced 22.89 cents as a fair mail revenue per 60-foot car mile. Applied to the passenger car-mile revenue for 1912, 24.29 cents, the result is 21.87 cents. The 60-foot car-mile revenue received by the railroads at the rates provided in the department bill, based upon the service estimated as being necessary for the fiscal year of 1915, would be 22.96 cents.

TOTAL PAY WOULD BE INCREASED BY CHANGE.

The total mail pay upon the present basis, including both pay for weight and pay for space, for the fiscal year of 1915, was more than $59,000,000. The rates carried in the proposed law would have resulted in a payment for that year of about $62,000,000, estimated on the basis of the service in operation. For service as of present date the expenditure would probably be somewhat greater, although legitimate economies in the way of concentrated loading and dispatches and along other lines would it is believed, tend to reduce such increase materially.

Although the facts would warrant a reduction of railway mail compensation, the Post Office Department has not advocated this action.

"NOT EXCEEDING" CLAUSE IS UNJUSTLY ATTACKED.

The proposed law authorizes the Postmaster General to pay not exceeding the rates specified in it.

The railroads have contended that this and other phraseology of the bill give the Postmaster General arbitrary rate-making power which, it is insinuated, he would use to compel the roads to carry the mails for less than the maximum rates designated. By inference, the charge is made that the Postmaster General is seeking power he does not now possess, and it has been declared in so many words that he would use this power to oppress the railroads.

In every law enacted by Congress on the subject of railway mail pay, since Congress first legislated 77 years ago in regard to the carriage of mails on railroads (July 7, 1838), the Postmaster General has been given free and full power to contract with a railroad for the carriage of mails at any rate within the maximum rates named in the several laws if he should be able to do so.

During the life of the present railway mail pay statute, passed in 1873, no Postmaster General has arbitrarily reduced rates, though under the law he has had full power to do so. The history of the service for the last 40 years sufficiently refutes the charge that the inclusion of the words "not exceeding" will give the Postmaster General power which he would use in an autocratic or unfair manner.

OPERATES TO PROTECT DEPARTMENT AND ROADS.

The flexibility of the provision "not exceeding" is absolutely necessary for practical administration, and works both in the interest of the Government and many of the railroads. If rates were absolutely fixed, the Government would be compelled to use the short line between the large mailing centers, and could not give the competing roads having longer lines the privilege, as is done now, of hauling a part of the mails at the rate for the short line.

Also, if the rates were inflexible there would be innumerable instances in the conduct of the service involving disputes between the railroad companies and the department as to the precise amount due for service, and the usual order of the Postmaster General, which, if it fixes the rate within the maximum prescribed by law, has been held by the courts to be final, would only mark the beginning of numerous and vexatious lawsuits.

WHAT MAIL PAY MEANS TO PARCEL POST SERVICE.

In little more than two years the parcel post has grown so rapidly that its annual traffic is now estimated at 1,000,000,000 parcels a year. This expansion demonstrates the public need and demand in this country for a service which for years has been provided in every other advanced nation on earth.

This tremendous burden of service has been successfully assumed by the postal establishment, and is being performed at a margin of profit for the Government notwithstanding the inordinately heavy transportation costs—at times amounting to double the transportation costs borne by the express companies upon a great part of their traffic—which the Government has been compelled to shoulder.

In the face of the unequal conditions the Government is doing an enormous parcel business at charges to the public much lower on the whole than were made by the express companies before the coming of the parcel post, and is giving express facilities alike to practically every township, hamlet, village, and city, great or small, in the United States.

Upon the majority of these great mail routes mail and express transportation conditions are practically identical. The cost to the railroads of the incidental services rendered in transporting the mails on these routes is inconsiderable as compared with the great disparity in the returns from the two services. It follows from the inequality of transportation costs that the parcel post rates to the public, for the higher weights, greatly exceed the express rates. Between New York and Chicago parcel postage is $1.20 for 20 pounds, as compared with an express rate of 68 cents. A more equitable scale of mail pay would make possible a readjustment of parcel postage upon the higher weights and long hauls, would expand the public's transportation facilities and would still give the railroads adequate compensation under their own standard of what constitutes adequate compensation—to wit, a "commercial rate."

The railroads are receiving from the Government amounts which, for hauls of any considerable length, exceed by about two to one the amounts they receive from the express companies for like and similar service.

ADVANTAGES OF THE SPACE BASIS—INCREASE OF SERVICE IS AUTOMATICALLY PAID FOR—JUSTICE TO ALL THE RAILROADS—BETTER FACILITIES FOR HANDLING PARCEL-POST MATTER ASSURED.

Under the space basis of payment provided in the Moon bill and in the appropriation bill, and agreed to by the conference committee on the latter, fluctuations in service would be promptly recognized and compensated.

If the expansion of the parcel post resulted in need of additional space, it would be paid for. At the same time the department would have opportunity for economies in the utilization of the authorized space to its maximum capacity, which entirely proper action would work no injustice to the railroad companies, because they would still be paid for all space provided.

It is the belief of the department officials, and of many railroad officials as well, that the space plan would enable all service furnished according to the needs to be properly compensated; in other words, the department would pay for what it receives, and the railroads would receive pay for all service furnished.

SQUARE DEAL ASSURED TO ALL THE RAILROADS.

Under the space plan, each company will receive compensation for all service performed by it, and changes in service requiring additional space will be immediately recognized by authorization of additional space and pay. This will eliminate complaints regarding cases wherein heavy diversions of mail are made from one route to another without changes in pay, which are continually occurring under the existing weight system.

Under the present law it is often asserted that the pay is inequitable between companies, in that there may be two routes carrying the same weight of mail, upon one of which the space and facilities required may greatly exceed those required on the other route, notwithstanding which each company receives the same pay. The new plan will correct inequalities of this kind.

EXISTING RATES PAY FOR FOUR-YEAR INCREASE OF MAIL.

Under the present law, one of the principal complaints of the companies has been that during the four-year period between adjustments the increased weights of mails carried by them are transported without compensation. The railroads advance this as their principal argument for annual instead of quadrennial weighings, asserting that it is inequitable and unjust to require them to carry the accretions without additional pay.

The department has taken the position that the rates provided in the existing law were fixed high enough to cover the increased regular mails to be carried during the term. Nevertheless, cases have arisen where schedule changes or unusual conditions have resulted in diverting to a line a considerable quantity of mails not theretofore carried and not weighed on that line, with a corresponding reduction in weights carried on the line from which diverted. Unless the weights diverted equal at least 10 per cent of the average daily weight on any of the routes involved, the department is without authority to restate the pay and correct the inequity.

The proposed law corrects these inequalities, and the administration of the service under its provisions will enable the department to compensate the railroads for all service performed. Fluctuations in the volume of mail which require the furnishing of a greater or lesser amount of space than regularly authorized can be met by the authorization on lines where such conditions obtain of a certain amount of space beyond the regular authorizations to be used and paid for when needed. This extra space would, of course, not be used if surplus space is available on another line affording equal service for the mails involved.

SAVES $600,000 A YEAR ON RETURNING EQUIPMENT.

There is usually a preponderance of mail tonnage in one direction, and the space required in that direction is necessarily greater than is needed in the return movement. Under the provisions of the proposed law the maximum space needed in either direction is to be determinative of the space to be paid for in return.

On account of the heavier movement of mails in one direction the equipment used to inclose the mails naturally accumulates, after use, at points remote from the centers where the mails originate. Under existing law, this equipment is returned to points where needed by freight at considerably less expense than if returned by mail. The annual cost of such service aggregates about $600,000.

Under the new plan, which specifies that the companies shall be paid for the round-trip movement of a car of the maximum size needed in either direction, there will probably be a surplus of unsued space available in the return movement which may be utilized for the carriage of a greater part, if not all, of this returning empty equipment without additional cost and with a saving of its transportation cost by freight. Other opportunities for the use of return empty space paid for and not needed for mails will no doubt present themselves in the carriage of supplies and stamped paper for the service, and of periodicals now sent by fast freight.

CARS WILL BE USED TO THEIR CAPACITY.

The tendency under the space plan will be to load authorized cars to the maximum consistent with the conditions required for distribution and handling. Under the weight basis, where the weight is paid for no matter whether transported in postal cars, baggage cars, or storage cars, the tendency is to relieve the distributing cars wherever possible and carry mails in baggage or storage cars.

Under the space basis the space in the authorized railroad post-office cars will be utilized to capacity before authorizing additional space in storage or baggage cars, thus relieving the baggage cars of their loads. The new plan also affords opportunity for consolidating mails for transportation between large centers where more than one line is available and the utilization of all authorized space to capacity before it will be necessary to authorize additional space for additional mails.

In cases where several partly loaded cars are now carrying the mails, it will be practicable to concentrate the mails in a less number of cars, thus securing the most economical loading and reducing the car mileage to be paid for to the minimum. This will provide an entirely proper economy with no burden on the railroads.

POSTAL EXPRESS SHIPMENTS—EMPTY MAIL BAGS SHIPPED BY EXPRESS TO AVOID THE HIGH MAIL RATE.

The department is authorized by law to ship by mail from November 15 to January 15 empty mail bags ordinarily sent by freight. Mail bags may go by express at any time, but are customarily shipped by freight unless an emergency arises, as the express rate is usually more than double that of the freight rate.

During the recent holiday period it was found that shipments could be made by express at a lower rate than by mail between many points, and the express service was utilized to a considerable extent at an average saving of 37½ cents per hundred pounds over the cost had they been sent in mail trains, and the railroad companies get only 50 per cent of the express rate.

The following table shows some of the points between which the department shipped mail bags by express during the holiday season of 1915, the mail and express rates, and the amount saved in each case by using express:

KEEN COMPETITION LEADS ROADS TO TAKE LESS THAN MAXIMUM PAY.

To share in mail transportation between competitive points many railroads enter into "equalization agreements" with the Post Office Department under which they perform service for less than the maximum pay under the law. Under these agreements, the companies accept the low rate in order to retain the carriage of the mails.

The following table shows the companies now carrying mail under "equalization agreements," the points between which mail is carried under these agreements, the maximum pay authorized by law in each such case, the pay accepted by the carriers to meet competition, and the resulting per cent of reduction from the maximum pay.

Companies.	Points.	Maximum pay per annum under the law.	Pay per annum accepted to meet competition.	Decrease, per cent.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 9, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we take Thy name reverently and come before Thee with godly fear. We pray Thee to help Thy servants in the Senate to keep the heart of this Nation true and good. Our friendships are created, our interests are conserved, our patriotism deepened by the touch of God upon the life of the people. May Thy servants in the Senate lead the way, remembering that forgetfulness of God is the sacrifice of the highest interests both for this life and the world to come. So may we hold to Thee that we may know Thee and well discharge the sacred duties imposed upon us in Thy fear and with Thy favor. For Christ's sake. Amen.

Believing that the present program of preparedness now before the Congress of the United States, entailing as it does a tremendous increase in the appropriations of the Nation, is unnecessary at this time, and realizing that the danger of war and the menace of militarism are increased by copying the war policy of Europe, we, the petitioners herewith subscribed, respectfully request you to use all honorable means at your command to defeat the administration plan of preparedness. FRIGATE "CONSTITUTION"—CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, day before yesterday a letter from the Secretary of the Navy regarding the condition of the frigate Constitution was laid before the Senate. At my suggestion it was sent to the Committee on Appropriations. Manifestly it should go to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I ask for that change of reference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SANDUSKY, OHIO.

Mr. SWANSON. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4308) to purchase a site and erect thereon a suitable building for post office and other governmental offices at Sandusky, Ohio, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 117) thereon. I call the attention of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill, and I will state my reason for it very briefly.

On March 4, 1913, Congress authorized the construction of a new building on the old site in the city of Sandusky, Ohio. On March 3, 1915, Congress appropriated $92,000, to be made immediately available, $80,000 to be applied toward the construction of the new building and $12,000 to provide temporary quarters for the Government offices. After this legislation was enacted the citizens of Sandusky decided that they wanted to change the site. It is the purpose of the bill to authorize this change—the construction of the building upon the new site, and the sale of the old site, for which they have now a bid guaranteed of not less than $70,000.

The bill increases the appropriation only $15,000, and the reason for asking its immediate consideration is because the citizens have options on two available sites which will expire March 1, and they fear they could not get a site so satisfactory on as good terms if these options were permitted to expire.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CARLOS HEVIA Y REYES GAVILÁN.

Mr. STONE. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 95) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis Mr. Carlos Hevia y Reyes Gavilán, a citizen of Cuba.

A similar joint resolution was passed by the Senate some time since. It was introduced in the House at practically the same time it was introduced in the Senate, and the House joint resolution having been passed and sent here, I now ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. PHELAN. I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, authorized to permit Mr. Carlos Hevia y Reyes Gavilán, a citizen of Cuba, to receive instruction at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States thereby, and that the said Carlos Hevia y Reyes Gavilán shall agree to comply with all regulations for the police and discipline of the academy, to be studious, and to give his utmost efforts to accomplish the course in the various departments of instruction, and that the said Carlos Hevia y Reyes Gavilán shall not be admitted to the academy until he shall have passed the mental and physical examinations prescribed for candidates from the United States, and that he shall be immediately withdrawn if deficient in studies, of conduct, and so recommended by the academic board.

Mr. PHELAN. I have no objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed Senate joint resolution No. 81, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis Mr. Carlos Hevia y Reyes Gavilán, a citizen of Cuba, and that the House be requested to return to the Senate the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notice will be entered.

THE PATENT OFFICE.

Mr. JAMES. From the Committee on Patents I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 683) prohibiting the use of the name of any Member of either House of Congress or of any officer of the Government by any person, firm, or corporation practicing before the Patent Office in advertising his business, and I call the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] to the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, this bill is identical with one which passed during the last session of Congress. It is very much desired by the Commissioner of Patents, in order to relieve his office of the abuses to which the bill refers. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation practicing before the Patent Office to use the name of any Member of either House of Congress or of any officer of the Government in advertising the said business.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect three months after its date.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INCREASE OF MIDSHIPMEN—UNITED STATES NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. TILLMAN. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 9224) providing for an increase in number of midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. It is a House bill. I tried to get the bill through on yesterday, but the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] objected. He has since withdrawn his objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not object, because I have no objection to the consideration of the bill at this time, but——

Mr. TILLMAN. I have seen the Senator from Wisconsin, and he told me he had withdrawn all objection; that he did not know what the bill was when I asked for its consideration on yesterday.

Mr. SMOOT. He has no objection?

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Wisconsin has no objection at all to the passage of this bill. He is very anxious for it to go through.

Mr. LODGE. Which bill is this, Mr. President?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The bill providing for an increase in the number of midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter there shall be allowed at the United States Naval Academy 3 midshipmen for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress, 1 for Porto Rico, 2 for the District of Columbia, 10 appointed each year at large, and 15 appointed annually from enlisted men in the Navy as now authorized by law.

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NEW YORK AND MARE ISLAND NAVY YARDS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 98, making part of the appropriation "Construction and machinery, increase of the Navy," in the naval act approved March 3, 1915, available for the extension of building ways and equipment at the navy yards at New York and Mare Island, Cal.

Mr. LODGE. That joint resolution is on the calendar.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is on the calendar, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. JONES. Let the joint resolution be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will ask if this measure will lead to any debate?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not think so.

Mr. LODGE. No; I do not think so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That of the money heretofore appropriated under the appropriation "Increase of the Navy, construction and machinery," in the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, approved March 3, 1915, the sums of not exceeding $100,000 for navy yard, New York, and not exceeding $500,000 for navy yard, Mare Island, Cal., are hereby made available for the extension of building ways and equipment necessary for the construction of battleships or battle cruisers in those yards.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Nevada that this joint resolution is on the calendar, and, of course, it can be taken up on motion.

I shall detain the Senate for only a moment. This is an emergency measure of the strongest kind. It ought to be passed at once as it came from the House. It makes no new appropriation. It simply makes available money already appropriated.

Battleships 43 and 44 were authorized one year ago at this time. They were sent by the Secretary of the Navy to Mare Island and New York. The ways in both of those yards are occupied, and the ways at Mare Island are not big enough to take a superdreadnaught, and there is no money with which to extend them. If this money is not given, they will not be extended. Therefore it is of the utmost importance that this money shall be made available at once for the purpose of extending the Mare Island ways and getting equipment to the New York ways.

What I want to call attention to is the fact that by the time the keels of those ships are laid it will be 18 months from their authorization. Now, we build a battleship in three years. That is a little longer, though not so much longer, as is commonly said, than the English or German rates; but we waste a whole year and a half before we begin to build them. If we need any increases in the Navy, we need them now. This is a step toward getting as quickly as possible the ships authorized last year, which can not be begun before September or October. I hope the joint resolution will pass immediately.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I desire in this connection to have printed in the RECORD at this point a letter I have just received from the Secretary of the Navy that throws some light upon the bids of private contractors upon the battleships 43 and 44, and so forth, and the advantage in these instances of construction in Government yards.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be received and printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Time of construction: The department's circular to prospective bidders on these vessels stated that no bids would be considered which proposed a period for construction in excess of 34 months. Prior to the opening, several of the prospective bidders protested against this provision, stating that under the prevailing conditions of the labor and material markets it would be impracticable to guarantee completion in that period. The contractors were then informed that a bid containing a time guarantee in excess of 34 months would not be thrown out on that account, but preference in consideration would be given to bids proposing the shortest time for construction.

The Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. in their proposal offered a constructional period of 40 months. The Fore River Shipbuilding Corporation proposed 34 months, but in a letter forming a part of their bid stated:

"Referring to our proposal herewith submitted for the construction of one of battleships Nos. 43 and 44 and to paragraph 12 of the confidential circular of requirements for bidders, which states that the maximum time allowed for completion of these vessels will be limited by the department to 34 months, and that no bid that proposes to exceed this limit will be considered, we beg to invite attention to our letter of the 28th ultimo to the Secretary of the Navy, specifying in detail why we do not consider it practicable to construct this vessel within the limitation of time as specified by the department. In spite of this fact we are able to put in a proposition that will comply with the department's circular, because we know that the steel market is at present in such condition that after the receipt of our orders for structural material a time that would ordinarily be unreasonable will be required for its delivery. Paragraph 9 of the contract distinctly provides that this shall be a reason for extension of contract time, and it is because of this clause of the contract and of our knowledge of the steel situation that we are submitting this bid.

"We are convinced that there will be delay on the part of the Government in providing the material that it furnishes under the third clause of the contract, because this is affected by the same conditions that render it impracticable for us to obtain structural material within the time necessary to carry this vessel to completion in 34 months. The third clause of the contract provides that such delay shall entitle the contractor to an extension of time for the completion of the vessel."

The New York Shipbuilding Co. likewise proposed 34 months, but in a similar letter stated:

"In making our proposal to deliver this vessel in 34 months we make special reference to the provisions of the form of contract, clauses 3 and 9, for the protection of the builder, for the reason that, should existing conditions in obtaining materials continue, it is extremely likely that there will be considerable delay in the delivery of the ship, unavoidable and quite beyond the control of the builder."

The pertinent portions of the contract clauses 3 and 9 referred to above provide that if armor and ordnance supplied by the Government shall be delayed in delivery to the contractor and thereby delay the construction of the ship, he shall be entitled to a corresponding extension of the contract time. Also that he shall be entitled to extension of the contract time for delays caused by the act of the department or by fire or water or by strikes or by other circumstances beyond his control, but that such circumstances shall not be deemed to include delays in obtaining material unless the contractor failed to obtain delivery after having ordered the material in proper time and used every reasonable effort to get delivery.

In view of the fact that the amount authorized by Congress for the construction of these ships was $7,800,000 each, and the lowest cost of construction by private contractors was $8,068,100, or $268,100 in excess of the sum the Secretary of the Navy was authorized to expend, no recourse was open but to decline to make an award at a figure above the legal authorization.

Added to this insuperable reason why the contract could not be awarded to either of the private shipbuilding concerns upon their bid was the additional fact that neither company guaranteed to complete the ship at any fixed date within a reasonable time. The Newport News Co. frankly placed 40 months as the shortest time for delivery, and the other bidders were equally frank in pointing out that delay must be expected, so that they could give no assurance of early completion. On the contrary, as will be seen above, the companies pointed out the reason why, if awarded the contract, the Government must expect delay in the completion of the ships.

The New York Navy Yard estimated that it could build a ship within 36 months at a cost of $7,069,923. It is estimated that $100,000 will be needed for plant improvements. The Mare Island Navy Yard estimated that it could build a ship for $7,413,156, including certain necessary preparations for construction estimated at $244,748. It also stipulated that other money would be needed to further equip the yard during construction. Their estimates showed a saving of $654,944 over the lowest bid of the private shipbuilding companies and a time of construction of 31 months after receipt of structural material. Even with the necessary delay to extend the slip and provide other equipment at Mare Island it is believed that the Government can complete the ships at as early a date as any of the private shipbuilding yards, all of which are crowded with private contracts.

Before awarding the building of these ships to the navy yards I took the precaution of making contracts for steel and armor plate, with guaranties of prompt delivery, and directions have been given to make like contracts for all material needed, so there will be no unnecessary delays. The machinery is now under advertisement. The price quoted for the steel needed in construction was slighly lower than the estimate previously made by the two yards awarded the contract.

The prompt action by the House of Representatives in authorizing the expenditure of $600,000 of the $1,920,769 between the lowest bids of the private shipbuilders and the navy-yard estimates will enable the Navy Department to lose no time in making every preparation so that the work can be pushed to the utmost as soon as the ways are clear.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 10385. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

IMPROVEMENT OF ROADS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, three or four days ago, when the hour of 2 o'clock arrived the Senate was considering a motion which I made requesting the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to return a certain bill to the Senate in order that it might be referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. President, I have no pride of opinion as to what a good-roads bills shall contain, provided it will lead to the improvement of roads, and I have no pride of opinion whatever as to the person who shall offer such a bill; but this bill—a House bill which came over here—I am persuaded was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry through an inadvertence or a mistake, created perhaps by the caption or title of the bill itself. If Senators will read the title of the bill and then will read the first section of the bill, they will conclude at once, necessarily, that the title of the bill was carefully prepared with the purpose of misleading the Chair and the clerks at the desk. I am going to read the title of the bill, Mr. President, in order that the Senate may understand it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the number?

Mr. BANKHEAD. H. R. 7617, an act to provide that in order to promote agriculture, afford better facilities for rural transportation and marketing farm products, and encourage the development of a general system of improved highways, the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall in certain cases aid the States in the construction, improvement, and maintenance of roads which may be used in the transportation of interstate commerce, military supplies, or postal matter.

For a number of years, Mr. President, this question has been before the Senate. It has been discussed on the floor of the Senate. A number of bills have been introduced in each session of Congress providing for what is commonly called national aid in support of building and maintaining post roads. There are a half dozen bills of that character now before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. They are being there considered. Of course we do not desire any conflict; we do not desire any precipitate action; we do not desire an effort on the part of one committee to rush into the Senate and put a bill on the calendar in advance of the other. All I am asking is that the Senate shall consider this question in connection with the title of this bill and the body of the bill, in which no reference is made to agriculture and the improvement of roads for the transportation of agricultural products. It was understood from the beginning in the other House and in this Chamber that this bill, or a bill on this subject, was intended purely and exclusively to aid in the building and maintenance of post roads, roads over which the mails of the country were to go, and in order that the rural service might be extended to every part of the country where it was practical to go with a road over which the carriers could travel. That is the only purpose of the bill.

I do not care to say any more on the subject. I am entirely willing to leave the matter to the Senate. This bill has only the purpose to aid in the construction of post roads. I do not know that Congress has authority to appropriate money for the building of any roads except post roads. That is a question, however, that I do not propose to discuss here and now. The only question, Mr. President, is whether or not the Post Office Committee of the Senate, having had these matters under consideration, which have always been regarded as within their proper jurisdiction, shall consider this bill and report it at an early day, as I am sure the committee will, and let the Senate dispose of it. On the other hand, if the Senate shall conclude that the question may be more successfully and wisely handled by the Agricultural Committee, of course I shall have nothing further to say.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it is true that there have been road bills referred to the Post Office Committee; it is also true that road bills have been referred to the Agricultural Committee. There have been bills upon this subject before each of those committees, I think, for the past four years. I would say that ordinarily a bill upon this subject might be referred to either committee, but this particular House bill not only through its title, which the Senator from Alabama indicates should carry it to the Agricultural Committee, but all through the bill contains provisions that should carry it to the Committee on Agriculture. When the bill came from the other House the Presiding Officer saw the title of the bill and referred it to the Committee on Agriculture. It is true that several friends of the measure believed that the Committee on Agriculture was the proper committee to which it should be referred, and would have moved to so refer it, but the President of the Senate referred it to the Committee on Agriculture without a motion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Under what provision of the Constitution does the Senator from Georgia think that Congress has power to provide for the building of roads to promote agriculture?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Under the same provision of the Constitution under which Congress had power to establish the Agricultural Department and to establish a bureau in the Agricultural Department that has charge of road work. The Senator from Utah can answer that question himself.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Under what provision of the Constitution is that done?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Utah has been here longer than I have and has been voting upon these questions, and therefore I do not think he needs any information from me.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me to say so, I asked the question in absolute good faith, because I am myself unable to see on what theory Congress can appropriate money to build roads to promote agriculture. We can undoubtedly build roads for post-office purposes, as the Constitution has authorized Congress to establish post offices and post roads; we may build military roads under the war power; and perhaps—though I am not sure about that—we may build roads under the commerce clause of the Constitution as a regulation of interstate commerce; but certainly Congress has not any power to expend money for the mere purpose of promoting any branch of industry within a State.

The point that I was finally coming to was to suggest to the Senator from Georgia that, after all, whatever committee this bill was referred to, it ought to be one of the committees that deals with the subject matter which the Constitution recognizes. The bill ought to go to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, perhaps, because that committee has jurisdiction over that subject, or it might go to the Committee on Military Affairs, if a military road is contemplated; but I can not see——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It might go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Or possibly it might go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But it seems more appropriately to belong to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I concede that the bill might go to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; that it might go to the Committee on Military Affairs; that it might go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce—each of those three propositions is submitted in the remarks of the Senator from Utah—but where does the Government administer its work in connection with roads? It administers none of its work under either of those three departments; it does no road construction or road supervision in the Post Office Department; it does none in the Department of Commerce; it does none in the military department; but Congress has established as a branch of the Agricultural Department a Good Roads Bureau. It has an organization, to which appropriations have from time to time been made to stimulate the construction of better roads and to teach the mode of constructing better roads.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia permit an interruption?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will for a question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Congress is not undertaking to build the roads; Congress is simply undertaking to determine whether or not the roads ought to be built. If I am correct in saying that money expended for this purpose must be under one or the other of the clauses of the Constitution to which I have referred, namely, under the post-office clause or the war power or the commerce clause, or all of them, perhaps; in any event, Congress must determine whether or not there is a military necessity for such road construction if it is put upon that clause of the Constitution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am willing to yield to the Senator from Utah for a question, but I am not willing to yield for him to make a speech.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not going to make a speech.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will ask the question, I will yield; otherwise I shall not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course, if the Senator from Georgia is to dictate to me the precise length of my question, I shall have to yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If it is a question, well and good; but it did not sound like a question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is a question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I yield, Mr. President, and agree that the Senator from Utah shall shape his question in his own way.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I was simply laying the foundation for the question. As I was saying, if the expenditure of this money is to be justified under the war power as a necessity, then that question should be passed upon by the committee which deals with that subject, namely, the Military Committee. If it is to be a road to be built under the post-office clause of the Constitution, then the appropriate committee should determine whether there is good reason for calling into exercise that power, the necessity for post roads, and so on, with reference to the other clause of the Constitution, namely, the commerce clause.

What I desire to ask the Senator is, upon what theory, if I am correct about that, can either of those questions be submitted to the Committee on Agriculture, namely, the military necessity for roads, the necessity for them in connection with post-office affairs, or their use to carry out the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution? Neither of them presents an agricultural question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the bill is based on all three, so that if the selection of the committee to which the bill should go were to be governed by the line of thought suggested by the Senator from Utah, two-thirds of his reason would die, because only one of the three committees could have it. In point of fact, it is no reason at all. We should select a committee that will have supervision of the work after the bill is passed. We should select to consider the question a committee which has under its supervision the organization provided by the acts of Congress to administer the bill.

Now, let us see what that is; let us see what the bill provides. The Postmaster General has nothing to do with its execution; the Secretary of Commerce has nothing to do with its execution; the Secretary of War has nothing to do with it. The Senator from Alabama reads the first paragraph of the bill, and says that under that paragraph the bill should go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I did not say that. I said that the title of the bill and that paragraph were prepared in order to mislead the President of the Senate. That is what I said.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would regret to say that a bill was drawn by a Member of either House with language put in it that was intended to mislead the President of this body. It certainly could not mislead the Senate.

Now, let us turn to section 2, which reads:

SEC. 2. That out of any appropriation made under the provisions of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall deduct the sum which he shall deem necessary to defray the expenses of his department in the administration of this act—

And so forth.

The bill is to be administered under the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture reports to the Committee on Agriculture.

Now, let me read from another section of the bill:

SEC. 3. That as soon as may be after the passage of any act making appropriations under the provisions of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall prepare and file in his office a statement showing the amount of such appropriation he has set apart to defray the expense of his department in the administration of this act and the amount of the balance which will be available for expenditure in each State—

And so forth.

The State highway department of any State, after receiving the statement, may apply to the Secretary of Agriculture for aid.

The Secretary of Agriculture is required to examine the surveys, and he supervises the work. It is the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture that is exercised in passing upon the roads suggested by any State to determine whether the appropriation contemplated by this bill may be used in their improvement. The Secretary of Agriculture may make, or cause to be made, inspection and examination of the roads constructed. He is required to pass upon the question as to whether they are constructed according to the requirements of the bill. So, Mr. President, everything to be done under this bill will be done, so far as the Government is concerned, by the Secretary of Agriculture and by the forces of the Agricultural Department.

There is now a bureau in the Agricultural Department devoted to good roads. As the Department of Agriculture will execute this bill, surely the proper committee to which to send it is the committee which is in constant relationship with the Department of Agriculture. As the requirements of the bill are complied with the reports will come to, and examinations be made by, the Committee on Agriculture. I submit, Mr. President——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think the bill provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall make reports to Congress and not to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Secretary of Agriculture does make his reports to Congress, but the reports are referred to the Committee on Agriculture. Senators upon committees know that the head of a department whose work is performed in connection with a particular committee comes before that committee; his associates come before that committee; they cooperate with that committee; they study the problems with the committee; and the committee of the Senate upon which will fall the responsibility for the administration of this bill will be the committee that deals with the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. President, the bill has been sent to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The committee has had two meetings with reference to the bill. They were in session this morning, and they have adjourned to meet on Saturday. The committee this morning unanimously passed a resolution expressing the opinion that they had begun work upon the bill; that the bill had been properly referred to them, and advising that the Senate be requested to leave it there.

Of course it is a matter for the Senate. If you wish to discharge the Committee on Agriculture after it has commenced work upon this bill, those of us upon that committee are ready to give up the bill; but we think that if the bill becomes a law the Committee on Agriculture will be called on to administer the bill, and, therefore, it is the proper committee to which the bill ought to have been referred.

Mr. GALLINGER. Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to discharge the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry from the further consideration of House bill 7617 and to refer it to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to say a few words with relation to this matter before the question is submitted. The suggestion has been made that the bill should go to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads because of the fact that the authority to construct roads by the Federal Government is found in the clause of the Constitution relating to the transmission of the mails of the United States. As the Senator from Georgia has said, authority equally is found in the interstate-commerce clause, and also in the power to construct military roads, and both are also mentioned in this bill; but, Mr. President, I do not take it that the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of a bill makes it referable on that account to any particular committee.

When the act comes to be construed by the courts, the sole question will be as to whether or not it is constitutional. If any committee whatever has jurisdiction of the question of whether a bill is constitutional, it is the Judiciary Committee, and that committee is composed of eminent lawyers, capable of determining the question of the constitutionality of any measure that is presented; yet bills naturally belonging to other committees are not referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Therefore it seems to me that the determining factor as to where the bill should be referred does not depend upon whether the bill is constitutional or unconstitutional.

When the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was created there was never any intention in the mind of anybody that the Government should build roads for the postal routes; nobody ever suggested that. There never has been but one road, as I understand, to which the Government has ever contributed.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just for a moment?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does not the Senator know that both of the great parties of this country—practically all three of them, for that matter—have pledged their aid to the construction and maintenance of post roads in those words?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, well, that may be; but they did not declare that bills on the subject should be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; they were for building post roads, not agricultural roads.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, it is absurd to suppose that the roads are to be solely for the transmission of the mails. We know that the object underlying them all is to get good roads. There is no doubt about that. The Government would be very foolish to expend millions and millions of dollars simply to let one carrier go over the road once a day or once every two days. While that may be the hinge upon which you can justify the constitutionality of the act, the ultimate purpose of it, as everybody knows, is to get good roads, so that the farmers can get their products to market, and so that in every way rural life will be made more attractive to those who wish to pursue the occupation of farming.

The fact that a measure is constitutional or unconstitutional does not determine the committee to which it should be referred. There is contained in this bill a statement that it is also for the purpose of building roads for interstate commerce, and also for the purpose of building military roads. You can not segregate one object and say that one is of any greater importance than the other, as determining the committee to which a bill of this kind should be referred.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir; I will.

Mr. HARDWICK. When a bill of similar import to this came over during the last Congress, was it not referred without objection to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, that may be; but the fact is that the body of that bill and the body of this bill should not have been referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, because they deal with the subject of the Agricultural Department. Every line that is contained in this bill makes some reference to the Department of Agriculture, and provides that the Secretary of that department shall control the matter of building and approving the roads, the payment of the money, and all the other detail work that is necessary in order to complete a road.

Mr. President, from what fund is the money going to be appropriated to pay for the construction of these roads?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator desire to ask me a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to make a suggestion to the Senator. The Agricultural Department deals with a great many different questions. Its jurisdiction is very broad. It deals with questions with respect to which we derive our power of action from various and probably sundry provisions of the Constitution. Now, if before we refer a bill we must determine the source of our constitutional power to enact the proposed legislation, would we not necessarily have to deny the Committee on Agriculture the right to consider bills that relate to subjects the authority to legislate with respect to which is derived from some power in the Constitution other than that which authorizes the creation of an Agricultural Department?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me the position of the Senator is well taken. I can not conceive why, because there is a reference to the Constitution, one committee should have any preference over the other with relation to the measure. The bill may indirectly affect something within the jurisdiction of that committee, but what committee does it most affect?

Here is a bill which provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall do certain things. What committee has to pass upon the measures appropriating the amount of money that is to be spent in the building of roads? Is it the Post Office Committee? Is it proposed in any of these measures that the money shall be taken out of the postal receipts of the United States? Oh, no. If it were provided in any of these bills that the roads should be paid for out of the receipts of the Post Office Department, then there might be some reason, it seems to me, in sustaining the position that it should be referred to the Post Office Committee; but no such suggestion has ever been made, either in the bill that came to this body at the last session or in this bill or in any of the bills that I have seen.

The name of this committee is absolutely the only thing upon which those who advocate referring the bill to the Post Office Committee can hang a proposition of reference. What did that name mean at the time the committee was created? Did anybody ever think of building a post road by the Government at that time? Oh, no. It was not expected. They were expected to select routes and provide that the mail should be transported over those routes; but such a thing as taking money out of the Treasury and appropriating it for that purpose was never dreamed of by anyone. Is it possible, where a committee was named under the state of facts that existed at that time, that, therefore, it should sweep within its jurisdiction everything that relates to roads? I think not.

When this bill is enacted you will find that the Secretary of Agriculture, under this bill, will send to the Congress of the United States a report and a statement with reference to the amount of money needed each year for certain roads, and that communication will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture, where recommendations will be made to the Congress as to what should be done in the presentation of a bill for the appropriations necessary. For that reason, it seems to me, the bill ought to go there.

We have a bureau on good roads in the Agricultural Department now. Was the measure providing for that bureau referred to the Post Office Committee? If not, is it possible that the bureau is not constitutionally organized? Evidently the bill was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and unquestionably that committee had jurisdiction, and has provided the moneys for the bureau each year and keeps in touch with it. But the Post Office Department would never keep in touch with the bill which is now under consideration if it should become a law. It would have nothing to do with it. We would simply pass the bill and thereafter refer the communications and the appropriations to the Agricultural Committee.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this bill is clearly within the jurisdiction of the Agricultural Committee, and that the reference ought to stand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] is never more delightful than when he is engaged in the pleasant pastime of imagining an argument as having been made, in order that he may demolish it.

I do not think anybody has suggested that because this bill may involve a constitutional question therefore it should go to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, or to any other particular committee. I am not sure whether this bill involves a constitutional question or not. What I do say, however, is that in my judgment Congress has no power to build roads or highways except under one or the other of the constitutional provisions to which I have directed attention.

Congress may build a post road under the provision of the Constitution which gives it the power to establish post offices and post roads. If we are passing this bill under that power, then I say it is appropriate that the bill should go to the committee which deals with that subject matter.

Why do we create committees, and apportion jurisdiction to them, if it is not because they are to deal with those particular subjects—because they are constituted in such a way as to deal intelligently with those particular subjects?

Of course, it is perfectly apparent that the ingenious gentlemen who drew this bill wrote in the provision that it should be administered by the Agricultural Department in order that it might go to the Agricultural Committee, for some reason or other. Does the Senator from Colorado suppose that if an equally ingenious gentleman were to write into the shipping bill a provision that the Agricultural Department should administer that bill, it would thereby become an agricultural question, and the bill should go to the Agricultural Committee? If so, then it is a very simple thing to have nearly anything go to the Agricultural Committee which a Senator is interested in having go to that committee.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question. Has the Senator ever seen a bill for the construction of roads which provided that the revenue should come out of the postal receipts, or that the Postmaster General should have any connection whatever with it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the details of the various bills, and I do not care whether they so provide or not, because the question the Senator is asking me is wholly aside from the argument which I am making. I am making the argument that this appropriation can be justified only because it involves an expenditure for a post road or for one of these other matters I have named. If it involves an expenditure for a post road, obviously the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is the fit committee to determine whether or not such an expenditure is justified. The Agricultural Committee is not.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That depends entirely upon what is in the bill, what the detail of it is. The most important thing to be determined in this case is the detail of this bill as to what power shall be vested in the man who is to contract with the States with relation to building these roads.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And inasmuch as the Post Office Department has nothing whatever to do with it, but according to this and all the other bills the Agricultural Department has, it seems to me there should be no question as to the appropriate reference of this bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, the Senator from Colorado has made his argument twice—once in his own time and once in my time. Let me reply to it by saying that that is not, in my judgment, the important part of the bill. The details are unimportant compared with the main question which is involved, as to whether or not we should make the expenditure at all. The details can be worked out.

It is a matter of a good deal of immateriality, to my mind, whether, when we have determined to make the expenditure, we intrust the expenditure to the Agricultural Department or the Interior Department or some other department. But I insist that if we provide for this appropriation it must be under one or the other of these clauses of the Constitution.

If it is a military necessity that justifies the expenditure of this much money, then the Military Committee knows more about that than the Agricultural Committee does. If it is to regulate or facilitate interstate commerce, then the Committee on Interstate Commerce knows more about the subject than the Agricultural Committee. The main question is to determine whether or not we want to make the expenditure at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will ask the Senator to pardon me for a moment. The bill should go, however, to one or the other of these three committees. Of course it very often happens that the subject matter of a bill is such that it may be appropriately referred to one of two committees or one of three committees; but the fact that it can only be referred to one of those two or one of those three committees does not justify us in referring it to a committee entirely outside of any of the three.

I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If, however, the Post Office Committee could only consider its application to post roads and the Military Affairs Committee its application to the necessity for military roads and the Interstate Commerce Committee its application to interstate-commerce transportation, as you could not get the benefit of a committee that would handle all these necessities, is it not eminently proper that it should go where we do our road building?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, one of the things that inevitably must happen, no matter what the roads are used for, will be that they are to be used for post-office purposes. That will be one of them. The bill itself recognizes that, because it says:

> Shall in certain cases aid the State in the construction, improvement, and maintenance of roads which may be used in the transportation of interstate commerce, military supplies, or postal matter.

The bill further along allots the money as follows:

> Sixty-five thousand dollars to each State and one half of the remainder in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the population of all of the States as shown by the latest available Federal census and the other half of such remainder in the ratio which the mileage of rural free delivery and star mail routes in such State bears to the mileage of rural free delivery and star mail routes of all the States.

The roads are to be constructed with reference to that item; and among the three uses that I have mentioned, their use for post-office purposes clearly will be primary.

Of course it is possible to refer a bill to two committees jointly, or a subcommittee of two committees, to consider it, and that might be done; but certainly it ought to go to one or the other. As it seems to me that the question of the use for postal purposes predominates, the Post Office Committee, in my judgment, is the appropriate committee to which it should be referred.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, as I have said, and as I think the Senate understands, the purpose of this bill is to maintain post roads. The provisions of all of these bills require that there shall be a division; that the State shall put up so much money and the Government so much money; and that the amount appropriated to each State shall be determined by the number of miles of post roads in that State. That is one of the facts that must be ascertained. That, of course, can be done only by the Post Office Department; and there are other things as to which it is absolutely essential that information shall come from other departments. For instance, the Census Department must be consulted as to population, and so forth.

I do not think there can be any doubt that the Post Office and Post Roads Committee should have this bill. They have made the only appropriation that ever has been made by Congress to aid in the building of post roads. The Commiftee on Post Offices and Post Roads reported that appropriation. Nobody objected to it. The money was appropriated and expended under the direction of the Postmaster General and the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was expended under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No, it was not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I think it was. That is my clear recollection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has referred to the fact that we have once made an appropriation for building roads. I suppose he refers to the $500,000 appropriated for experimental legislation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; I referred to that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does not the Senator know that long before that appropriation was made there had been organized in the Department of Agriculture a Bureau of Good Roads?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, everybody knows that, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does not the Senator know that every Congress since the establishment of this bureau has been providing appropriations, in the Agricultural appropriation bill, for the purpose of enabling that bureau to assist in the construction of good roads in the States in conjunction with the States and communities, under the supervision of Government engineers, and that these roads were not technically constructed for the purpose of aiding the Post Office Department in connection with the transportation of mails, but chiefly for the purpose of demonstrating to the communities in which these roads were built the value and importance of improved, modernized roads?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question. Am I mistaken when I state that that appropriation, recommended by the Post Office and Post Roads Committee, was made on an amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the Senator is not mistaken about the $500,000 appropriated for experimental roads referred to by him.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Did not the Senator have the amendment referred to that committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. There was a bill pending before that committee and it was offered as an amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is one pending there now.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; there was a bill pending before that committee, and this amendment was referred, of course, to the committee having charge of that bill; but that does not answer the question. I have admitted that that particular bill, providing for the construction of an experimental road, was referred to the Post Office Committee; but the question which I ask the Senator, and which the Senator has not answered, is if it is not a fact that anterior to the passage of that bill for years there had been organized in the Department of Agriculture a Good Roads Bureau?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I answered that.

Mr. SIMMONS. And that that Good Roads Bureau has been, during all these years, receiving appropriations through the Agricultural appropriation bill for the purpose of aiding in the construction work of good roads in various States and communities.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the Senator is entirely mistaken. I answered his question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not understand it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I answered it by saying that every man in the United States, not only in the Senate but everywhere else, knew that the bureau was organized for that purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. Every person in the United States knows that there is in the Agricultural Department now, and that there was in the Agricultural Department before the passage of this $500,000 appropriation, a Bureau of Good Roads; but that was not the question I asked the Senator——

Mr. BANKHEAD. We all admit that. I have stated that there was.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is not the question at all.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I answered it in the beginning by saying that everyone knew it, and I supposed the Senator from North Carolina also knew it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know it and everyone else knows it. But the question I asked the Senator was whether Congress, through the appropriations made in the Agricultural bill, has not been raising money for roads purposes for years and years before the passage of the bill appropriating $500,000 for experimental road construction?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I never heard of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to ask the Senator, then, if he does not know that that bureau in the Department of Agriculture has for years been spending from $25,000 to $30,000 a year for the purpose of helping the States, by way of supervision and otherwise, of this Union in the construction of standardized roads and that this money is carried in the Agricultural and not in the Post Office bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina which department of the Government administers the pure-food law?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Agricultural Department.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Did the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry have anything to do with that?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; the Agricultural Committee recommends the appropriations for that purpose.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am not talking about that. I am talking about the legislation itself.

Mr. SIMMONS. I asked the Senator if any amendment or bill should be offered respecting the execution of our pure-food law or looking to the execution of our laws with reference to meat inspection, would it not go to the Agricultural Committee?

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no telling what committee it would go to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, as a matter of fact, the Agricultural Department has now and has had, and the Senator from Alabama knows it as well as I do, the control of appropriations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of law with reference to pure food and with reference to meat inspection. The Senator knows, too, that we do not get our power to legislate with respect to these subjects from any law with reference to the Agricultural Department, but that we get that power from the commerce clause of the Constitution. The Agricultural Committee has charge of legislation to execute these purposes, and yet the power to legislate upon those questions can not be found anywhere in the Constitution except in the commerce clause.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Alabama was on his feet.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I was simply on my feet to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he was through.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I am not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I just wanted to ask for a vote if he were through.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I am not through.

Mr. BRYAN. I wish to make a very good-natured suggestion to the Senator from North Carolina. I think the Senator will not be offended at it.

Mr. SIMMONS. No one can be offended at anything the good-natured Senator from Florida does.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me ask the Senator from North Carolina under what clause of the Constitution we have the power to build roads?

Mr. SIMMONS. Under the clause with reference to post offices and post roads, with reference to military roads and interstate commerce. Those are the three sources of power.

Mr. BRYAN. That is all, is it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is enough. Is it not enough when you can assign three different sources of power? That would seem to be sufficient.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator does not contend that there is any pork-barrel clause of the Constitution to which this could be referred.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I have no acquaintance with pork-barrel legislation whatever.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator evidently has not read this bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has read this bill very carefully, and the Senator discovered this in the reading of the bill, that the title of the bill declares that the legislation is in part for the purpose of promoting agriculture. Where did Congress get the power to create an Agricultural Department? If we have no constitutional power to promote agriculture, why have you instituted and established a Department of Agriculture. The title of the bill says—

> To promote agriculture, afford better facilities for rural transportation and marketing farm products, and encourage the development of a general system of improved highways.

That is declared to be the purpose of the bill. And then, Mr. President, after the purpose of the bill is thus specifically declared, it says when the roads are constructed they may be used as postal routes and for the transportation of interstate commerce.

Now, Senators say that there is no constitutional power for this legislation except the power to establish postal roads, and because of that they contend that this bill can not be appropriately referred except to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I maintain that if an unconstitutional bill is introduced in this body it is entitled to reference, and in determining the question of reference the Senate does not undertake to decide that question. That question, in the first instance, is for the committee, and it is a question for the Senate after the committee has acted and reported. The bill is, in the first instance, referred to the committee that seems to have jurisdiction of the subject matter and purpose as declared in the bill.

This bill provides for roads for the promotion of agriculture, and so on, to be used for transportation in interstate commerce or in carrying the mails, and confers all power and jurisdiction in the execution of the mandate of Congress upon the Secretary of Agriculture. At no place in the bill, as the Senator from Georgia has said, is the Postmaster General mentioned, and no duties in its execution are imposed upon him.

Mr. President, in the other House they have as we have a Post Roads Committee, but they have also a committee known as the Committee on Roads. When this bill was presented in that body it was not sent to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, but to the Committee on Roads.

Mr. President, I have said this much about the matter because I think it is one of very great interest. I do not say that the Senator from Alabama wants this bill referred to his committee because he is opposed to the principle involved in it. I will not be as ungenerous to the Senator from Alabama as he has been to the author of this bill. The Senator intimates that the author of the bill wrote in the title the provision as to its purposes, to which I have called attention, with a view to depriving his committee of jurisdiction and sending it to some other committee supposed to be more favorable to the legislation. I can not believe that; but if he did, Mr. President, it must have been because he felt that the Post Roads Committee was hostile to the legislation, and he wanted to get the legislation before a committee that had not already prejudged the case. I do not know any more justification for this intimation than there would be for an intimation that the Senator from Alabama wants to get it before his committee for the purpose of smothering it, and, of course, I would make no such imputation against the honorable Senator from Alabama.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to discharge the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry from the further consideration of House bill 7617 and to refer the bill to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. JAMES. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. GALLINGER. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. JAMES. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. BRADY] on account of illness. I will let this statement stand for the day.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. He is compelled to be away on account of illness in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

The Senator from Alabama moves to discharge the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry from the further consideration of House bill 7617, and that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, before the vote is taken by yeas and nays I think, in justice to myself, I should say just a word.

The other day when I took the attitude I did in reference to the bill I was not as familiar with the bill and all the circumstances surrounding it as I am now. In view of the fact that we have a Bureau of Good Roads under the Agricultural Department, and this legislation has already passed the House and been under discussion in the Agricultural Committee, and in view of the fact that it is the object of this legislation to get good roads, no matter from what committee it may come, and it will ultimately have to stand upon its own merits before this body, I shall not vote for the reference of the bill to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], and, in his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I inquire whether the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT], who is absent, and in view of that fact I shall not vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], but I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I inquire whether or not the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Maryland has not voted.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Then I withhold my vote, having a pair with that Senator. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. CATRON. I have a general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH. I transfer my pair, which I announced a moment ago, with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], and vote "nay."

Mr. FALL (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted thinking that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] had voted. Noticing that he has not voted, and having a pair with that Senator, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY]; and

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 30, as follows:

RELIEF OF THE ARMENIANS.

Mr. LODGE. I present a concurrent resolution, and ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 12) was read, as follows:

Whereas in countries now engaged in war there are several hundreds of thousands of Armenians in need of food, clothing, and shelter; and

Whereas great numbers of them have been required by conditions growing out of the state of war to leave their homes and their property, deprived of opportunity to make provision for their most elementary wants, causing starvation, disease, and untold suffering; and

Whereas the people of the United States of America have learned with sorrow of this terrible plight of great numbers of human beings and have most generously responded to the cry for help whenever such an appeal has reached them: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That, in view of the misery, wretchedness, and hardships which these people are suffering, the President of the United States be respectfully asked to designate a day on which the citizens of this country may give expression to their sympathy by contributing to the funds now being raised for the relief of the Armenians in the belligerent countries.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the concurrent resolution, but I send to the desk a newspaper clipping, which I ask the Secretary to read in connection with it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to reserve the right to object. I am anxious to proceed with the consideration of the calendar regularly.

Mr. LODGE. I can not think that this resolution will cause any debate whatever. It is precisely similar to the resolution relative to the Polish people and the one in relation to the Jews. The Armenians are in an equally evil plight.

Mr. NEWLANDS. With that understanding, I make no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the newspaper clipping which has been sent to the desk by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SAYS TURKS MADE TORCH OF AMERICAN—ESCAPED MEDICAL MISSIONARY RECOUNTS GHASTLY CRIMES AGAINST CHRISTIANS.

PETROGRAD, January 18.

Dr. Jacob Sargis, an American Methodist medical missionary, who has arrived in Petrograd after narrowly escaping death at the hands of the Turks and Kurds in Urumiah, Persian Armenia, asserts that among the outrages committed against the Christian refugees was the burning to death of an American doctor named Simon, or Shimmun, as he was known there. His identity was not further established, but the story of the outrage, as told by Dr. Sargis, was as follows:

"Dr. Shimmun was in the village of Supurghan when the Turks attacked that place. He was among those who took refuge on a mountain near the lakes. He was captured and told that since he had been a good doctor and had helped the wounded, they would not kill him, but that he must accept the Mohammedan faith. He refused.

"They poured oil on him and, before applying the torch, they gave him another chance to forsake his religion. Again he refused, and they set his clothes afire. While running in agony from the flames the Turks shot him several times. After he fell to the ground unconscious they hacked his head off."

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am a little astonished that a newspaper clipping of that character—from what source it comes we are not advised—should be presented in connection with this resolution. The resolution is a very proper appeal to the generosity, the sympathy, and the liberality of the American people in the hope of affording some measure of succor to a large number of men, women, and children who are suffering from the sad effects of the war. This clipping, I presume, is intended to give to this resolution—a resolution of high character and noble purpose—a kind of partisan color.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is aware that I did not present the clipping.

Mr. STONE. It is in line with some other things which have been presented here from time to time, but it seems to me that it is wholly out of place, especially at this time.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I offered the resolution; I did not present the newspaper clipping.

Mr. STONE. I know the Senator did not present the clipping; the Senator from Idaho sent it to the desk, but for what purpose he sent it it is difficult to say.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I simply wanted to accentuate the situation in that country. I trust it has not become improper for the Senate of the United States to know how citizens of the United States are being treated in other countries. I trust, Mr.

President, we have not become so supinely cowardly as to dread publicity of facts concerning the treatment of our citizens abroad.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not think we have become so supinely cowardly, or so cowardly in any other way, as to desire to conceal from the American people any facts showing mistreatment of American citizens by any power in the world. The clipping which the Senator from Idaho has sent up to be read in this connection, however, is from, or is supposed to be from, a newspaper, and the American people get their information very largely from newspapers. There can be no question in my mind that the purpose of the Senator from Idaho in sending that paper here at this time was not to inform the American people so much as to give, even to a resolution of this character, some partisan coloring, and I do not think it a proper or even a creditable thing to do.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this article can not possibly reflect upon one more than another. There is not a word in it nor an insinuation in it which reflects upon anybody.

Mr. STONE. What did the Senator send it up for?

Mr. BORAH. I sent it to the desk for the very reason that I stated. I think it is well for us to know and well for the public to know precisely what is transpiring. It has to do with a great many things which are before Congress.

Mr. STONE. What paper is that clipping from?

Mr. BORAH. It is from a New York paper; I have forgotten which one; but it was published in several.

Mr. STONE. The Senator does not even know the paper that printed it, and even the account itself is not very well verified. It leaves a question even as to whether the man was an American citizen.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is absolute proof.

Mr. STONE. It was a partisan purpose, Mr. President, the Senator had in view and in line with other things that he has been doing here in the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri wants to assume that that is a reflection upon his party, I have nothing to say as to that. If he is going to rise here whenever anything of that kind is put in the RECORD without any reference to the administration and assume that it is a reflection upon the administration, that is the business of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I merely meant to say, Mr. President, that the intention of the Senator from Idaho manifestly was to make some reflection.

Mr. BORAH. The only one here who has accentuated the partisanship of the matter or suggested it is the Senator from Missouri, and it must be by reason of the fact that there is some consciousness upon his part that it is a reflection on his party to have these facts revealed.

Mr. STONE. I am quite conscious that it is partisan in purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am strongly in favor of this resolution, and I desire to say just a word. We had a day set apart to raise funds for the Poles, a people who are in dire distress. Unless the newspaper press has been wrong in the statement, the relief for those people has been held up by the British Government, the British Government not allowing that relief to be sent to the Polish people. I trust that if this resolution is agreed to Great Britain will not interpose to prevent relief being sent to the Armenians.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

RAILROAD LANDS IN ARIZONA, NEW MEXICO, OR CALIFORNIA.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. President, I wish to call up Order of Business 78, Senate bill 3391, and ask for its immediate consideration. The bill is absolutely necessary or the statute of limitations will run by the 4th of March next, against the law which is now standing, which the bill proposes to extend for two years.

The bill is very short and provides that land belonging to the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad may be exchanged for scrip and the scrip located before the 4th of March next, and as that time will soon run out this bill extends the time for allowing it to be done. The land that they want to exchange is land upon which Indians are living, and the department wants it for the use of the Indians. That land is generally coal land, and the lands which they ask to have taken in exchange for them are not allowed to have coal. The bill is for the benefit of the Government, and I hope that it will be allowed to pass at once so that it can be promptly taken up in the House.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I shall be compelled to ask for the regular order. A resolution has been pending here for some days, which has been debated and ought to be disposed of.

Mr. CATRON. This bill will take but a minute.

Mr. GALLINGER. The morning business is not closed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There seems to be an objection.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there any further resolutions to be submitted? [A pause.] Morning business is closed, and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

THE CALENDAR.

The bill (S. 1053) to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes, was announced as first in order on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say that a bill has already passed the House with the same object as this bill. The Committee on Public Lands is holding hearings upon the same bill. For that reason I ask that this bill may go over, because I think the program will be that whenever the Public Lands Committee agrees upon the House bill it will report it and ask that it be substituted for this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I move that Order of Business 33, Senate joint resolution 60, which has been debated at some length, be taken up. It is a joint resolution creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 60.

The motion was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

NEWSPAPER PUBLICATION OF LAND-OFFICE NOTICES.

The bill (S. 1062) relating to the duties of registers of United States land offices and the publication in newspapers of official land-office notices was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 5, after the word "him," it is proposed to insert "or, in case of a public-land entry, by the entryman."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to ask whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has been acted upon, or whether it is pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MYERS subsequently said: I move that the vote by which Senate bill 1062 was passed a few minutes ago be reconsidered. It is my bill; I am the author of it. I was much interested in it and in a number of amendments which were pending. It was called on the calendar during my absence, when I was not here, and I knew nothing about it. I very earnestly desire to have the vote reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Without objection, the motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. MYERS. Can the vote be reconsidered now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Chair will put the question. The question is on the motion to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the bill take its place on the calendar where it was before.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

Mr. MYERS. I also ask unanimous consent that the vote by which each one of the two amendments to Senate bill 1062 was adopted be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The action of the body in passing the bill has been reconsidered, has it not?

Mr. MYERS. The action of the Senate in passing the bill was reconsidered, but not the action of the Senate in adopting the amendments.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Personally I know nothing about the merits of the amendments, but the Senator by the reconsideration of the bill has left it on the calendar. Many Senators who spoke about the bill heretofore are not present, and I do not want to give unanimous consent to reconsider the action of the Senate on the amendments.

Mr. MYERS. I think the bill ought to be allowed to go on the calendar in exactly the same condition it was on the calendar, without any amendment, before it was considered to-day. I think that is only fair to all parties.

Mr. SMOOT entered the Chamber.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Utah is now on the floor, he having just entered the Chamber, and I leave it to him.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is no objection whatever to the request made by the Senator from Montana to reconsider the bill and place it upon the calendar in the same position it held before.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be reconsidered, without objection.

Mr. MYERS. And that the vote upon the amendments as well be reconsidered and the bill be placed on the calendar just as it was before.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. That is unanimously agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. The request, I understand, is not, then, to consider the bill further.

Mr. MYERS. Oh, no.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I have no objection.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The position which the Senator from Montana takes is that it is necessary to reconsider the amendments that were adopted, and I think it is.

Mr. MYERS. That has been done by unanimous consent.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If that has been done, that puts it in a situation that is all right.

Mr. MYERS. I ask the Chair if the bill is on the calendar now in exactly the same condition it was at the close of business yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, the bill will go back as No. 9 on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the votes by which the bill was passed and the amendments agreed to have been reconsidered.

Mr. MYERS. And the bill is on the calendar as it was yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be. The clerks at the desk inform the Chair that the bill came before the Senate this morning with the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] pending.

Mr. MYERS. I know that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the Senator from Colorado had already been agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I simply want to say in this connection that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] was very much interested in the bill.

Mr. MYERS. This is not depriving him of any right. It is simply having the bill go on the calendar in the same way it was at 12 o'clock to-day, when the Senate opened.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so holds.

Mr. SMOOT. That will leave the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] pending when the bill comes before the Senate again.

Mr. MYERS. I am not trying to take away any right from anyone, and I do not want any of my own rights taken away in my absence.

Mr. GRONNA. I have no objection to the course proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the bill goes to the calendar in the same position as though it had not been reached and considered to-day.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 706) to amend section 260 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 609) to aid in the erection of a monument to Pocahontas at Jamestown, Va., was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 611) for the erection of a monument to the memory of Matthew Fontaine Maury, of Virginia, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States conferring upon women the right of suffrage, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have been asked by my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to state to the Senate, if that joint resolution should come up in his absence, that he would not like to have it considered. For that reason I ask that the joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

BEVERLY E. WHITEHEAD.

The bill (S. 707) for the relief of Beverly E. Whitehead, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, with an amendment, on page 1, line 13, after the date "1903" to insert "Provided, That not exceeding 25 per cent attorney's fee is allowed," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $102.60 to Beverly E. Whitehead for the balance due him for the transportation of the United States mails under contract prior to May 31, 1861, on route No. 6199, Georgia, said balance having been found due by the Auditor for the Post Office Department and reported to the Senate by the Auditor for the Post Office Department on January 17, 1903: Provided, That not exceeding 25 per cent attorney's fee is allowed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, is there a written report in this case?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think there ought to be reports in all such cases, Mr. President.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAN ANTONIO BICENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 72) to provide for holding the San Antonio Bicentennial Exposition in 1918 was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when this joint resolution was reached before, I objected to its consideration. The junior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] is temporarily absent from the Chamber. I have some amendments to offer which I think the Senator from Texas will accept, and therefore I simply ask that it may be temporarily passed over. If the Senator comes into the Chamber before 2 o'clock, it can then be considered, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire to ask what was done with Senate joint resolution 72. I did not hear it called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was passed over temporarily, at the request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], on account of the absence of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD].

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is satisfactory. I did not happen to catch that.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that if the Senator from Texas had been in the Chamber at the time I would not have objected to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is satisfactory.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to considering it at this time, now that he is here.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I was called out of the Chamber temporarily. I wish to say that it is satisfactory to me to have the joint resolution go over for to-day.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2406) to amend section 162 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 60) creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce, and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee was announced as next in order.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no desire to postpone or delay the consideration of this joint resolution, but it will be impossible to dispose of it in five minutes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state to the Senator from Idaho that whilst the bill of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] has been made the unfinished business, I believe he has indicated a willingness, when it comes up at 2 o'clock, to allow me to dispose of this matter, provided it can be done within a reasonable time.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will state, Mr. President——

Mr. CATRON. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. JONES. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will be passed over under the rule.

PROTECTION OF GAME IN YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

The bill (S. 3205) to amend "An act to protect the birds and animals in Yellowstone National Park, and to punish crimes in said park, and for other purposes," approved May 7, 1894, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following paragraph, forming part of section 4 of an act entitled "An act to protect the birds and animals in Yellowstone National Park, and to punish crimes in said park, and for other purposes," approved May 7, 1894, to wit:

"Any person found guilty of violating any of the provisions of this act or any rule or regulation that may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior with reference to the management and care of the park, or for the protection of the property therein, for the preservation from injury or spoliation of timber, mineral deposits, natural curiosities, or wonderful objects within said park, or for the protection of the animals, birds, and fish in the said park, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be subjected to a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both, and be adjudged to pay all costs of the proceedings," be amended to read as follows:

"Any person found guilty of violating any of the provisions of this act or any rule or regulation that may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior with reference to the management and care of the park, or for the protection of the property therein, for the preservation from injury or spoliation of timber, mineral deposits, natural curiosities, or wonderful objects within said park, or for the protection of the animals, birds, and fish in the said park, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be subjected to a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both, and be adjudged to pay all costs of the proceedings."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3331.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

Mr. SHIELDS addressed the Senate. After having spoken, with interruptions, for nearly two hours and a half he said: Mr. President, I think I shall have to decline to yield further. If allowed to proceed, I can finish in a very few minutes.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee a question? I am very anxious, as the Senator knows, to move an executive session. How long does the Senator think it will take him to conclude?

Mr. SHIELDS. I thought when I began that I would finish in less than an hour, and I myself have occupied only about that time, although it has been nearly three hours since I took the floor. In view of the Senator's desire to move to go into executive session I will ask that the pending bill be laid aside temporarily, and I will yield the floor.

[The speech of Mr. SHIELDS is printed in the Appendix.]

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I am very much obliged to the Senator.

I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 1 hour and 35 minutes spent in executive session the Senate, in executive session (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.), took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, February 10, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 9, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We lift up our hearts in gratitude and praise to Thee, O God our heavenly Father, for Thy goodness and for Thy wonderful works to the children of men, the intellectual gifts with which Thou hast endowed us, the tender and sweet affections which hallow our homes, for our great and growing Republic, for the religion which makes for righteousness in the soul. Help us to show our appreciation of these gifts and inestimable blessings by using but never abusing them, that we may be worthy of Thy love and protection. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan, on account of serious illness in his family.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I have been out of Congress for four years and have only an indefinite recollection of the new rules. Is there not a provision in the rules of the Congress that the committees shall elect their own chairmen?

The SPEAKER. There is not. Are there any other nominations? If not, they will be closed. Without objection, these various gentlemen will be considered as elected to the committees named.

There was no objection.

CONGRESS OF NEUTRAL NATIONS.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the world has stood aghast for a year and a half or more at the horrible war prevailing in Europe, and I desire now to read a resolution (H. J. Res. 147) which I propose to offer. It is as follows:

Resolved, etc., First. That the people of the United States of America, being a peace-loving people, opposed to oppression and aggression of every character and form, and thoroughly wedded to the governmental idea that each and every nation of the earth, weak or strong, should be allowed to work out its own destiny without molestation on the part of any other nation, do hereby declare an absolute and strict neutrality as between each and all the nations of the earth now engaged in war.

Second. That the people of the United States view with horror the awful war now being waged across the seas and sincerely desire, in the interest of humanity and civilization, that the said war may be brought to an end at as early a day as possible in a manner which will be honorable to each and all the contending parties.

Third. That, with a view to seeking such an honorable termination of hostilities, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to invite the supreme magistrate or ruler of each and every nation of the earth not engaged in the present war and, like the United States, neutral as between the contending parties, to send two representatives each to a congress of neutral nations, to be held at the city of Washington, D. C., United States of America, at such time as the President may name, to take counsel with each other and consider in what manner the neutral nations may be of service in bringing the war to an end and restoring peace to the distressed lands of our brothers across the seas, and for the further purpose of taking counsel together in order to agree upon and define the rights of citizens of neutral nations upon the high seas during the continuance of hostilities should their efforts to secure peace prove unavailing.

Fourth. That the President is hereby authorized to appoint two able and discreet persons to represent the United States at said congress.

Fifth that the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, is hereby appropriated to pay any and all appropriate expenses in and about said congress properly chargeable to the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I know of no other way officially that the United States and the neutral nations of the earth can do their duty in the premises in endeavoring to secure peace among these nations across the water. I therefore ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which he has read. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes on next Saturday, the anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, after the Journal has been approved and the business on the Speaker's table disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that on Saturday next, the anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, he be allowed to address the House for 20 minutes on the life and character of Abraham Lincoln after the Journal has been approved and the business on the Speaker's table disposed of. Is there objection?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I do not intend to object finally—I will ask to have coupled with that the consent of the House to first read the address of Abraham Lincoln delivered at Gettysburg.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I would have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks leave to read the Gettysburg address of Abraham Lincoln on Saturday next, before the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WHEELER] addresses the House. Is there objection to either one of these requests?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE WITHERSPOON.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Sunday, March 5, 1916, be set aside for appropriate memorial exercises on the life, character, and work of Hon. S. A. WITHERSPOON, late a Representative from the State of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that Sunday, March 5, 1916, be set aside as a day on which to memorialize his predecessor in Congress, Mr. WITHERSPOON. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

REORGANIZATION IN THE PATENT OFFICE.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of committees.

Mr. ALEXANDER (when the Committee on Patents was called). Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MORRISON], chairman of the Committee on Patents, is absent, and as ranking member of that committee and by direction of the committee, I call up the bill S. 900, amending sections 476, 477, and 440 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 476 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 476. There shall be in the Patent Office a Commissioner of Patents, one first assistant commissioner, one assistant commissioner, and five examiners in chief, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The first assistant commissioner and the assistant commissioner shall perform such duties pertaining to the office of commissioner as may be assigned to them, respectively, from time to time by the Commissioner of Patents. All other officers, clerks, and employees authorized by law for the office shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior upon the nomination of the Commissioner of Patents, in accordance with existing law."

SEC. 2. That section 477 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 477. The salaries of the officers mentioned in the preceding section shall be as follows:

"The Commissioner of Patents, $5,000 a year.
"The First Assistant Commissioner of Patents, $4,500 a year.
"The Assistant Commissioner of Patents, $3,500 a year.
"Five examiners in chief, $3,500 a year each."

SEC. 3. That so much of section 440 of the Revised Statutes as follows the words "In the Patent Office," and refers to said office only, be amended to read as follows:

"One chief clerk, who shall be qualified to act as a principal examiner.
"One librarian, who shall be qualified to act as an assistant examiner.
"Five law examiners.
"One examiner of classification.
"One examiner of interferences.
"One examiner of trade-marks and designs.
"One first assistant examiner of trade-marks and designs.
"Six assistant examiners of trade-marks and designs.
"Forty-three principal examiners.
"Eighty-six first assistant examiners.
"Eighty-six second assistant examiners.
"Eighty-six third assistant examiners.
"Eighty-six fourth assistant examiners; and such other examiners and assistant examiners in the various grades as the Congress shall from time to time provide for."

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 900), with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate bill 900, an act amending sections 476, 477, and 440 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to know what this bill is. The Clerk has just gotten to the point where we are enabled to tell.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is a bill to revise the inspector force in the Patent Office.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes to reorganize the examining corps of the Patent Office by amending sections 476, 477, and 440 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to put into the Revised Statutes certain provisions which have been carried in appropriation bills, and other changes which I will undertake to point out specifically. The bill makes no change in salary from the salaries carried in the appropriation bills for some years past and creates no new offices. But, as will be indicated, it changes the number of employees. The greatest and most important change proposed is to equalize the number of first, second, third, and fourth assistant examiners. At present there are 110 fourth assistants, 88 third, 73 second, and 63 first. Now, the Commissioner says this is objectionable for the following reasons:

Each primary examiner has to supervise the work of twice as many assistants as was the case 30 years ago. It is not practicable to increase the number of primary examiners, because it splits up the classes to an inadvisable extent, and the only relief for an excessive number of assistants relatively to the number of primary examiners is to have more assistants of higher grades and therefore better trained in their work and with better knowledge of their classes. There are on an average 2½ fourth assistants and 1½ first assistants to each division. I am proposing to equalize this and to have 2 for each division in each grade.

The proposed change will also tend to keep the assistants longer in the office, because of the increase of the rate of promotion. During the first two or three years the assistants are of comparatively slight value. The present minimum salary is necessary to get the class of men we need, but it is only by keeping them here for 8 or 10 years that the average quality of service that is required can be secured. The increase in the appropriation per annum by reason of the equalization of the number of assistants is less than $23,000, and as the total appropriations for salaries for the whole number of assistants is more than $600,000, this slight increase in salary of the assistants will be far outweighed by the percentage of increase of efficiency.

There are other changes which I will indicate:

First. The bill provides specifically for the post of first assistant commissioner, an office created by the appropriation act of 1909, and fixes his salary at $4,500, which has been the salary since the office was established.

This office has been created and the office provided for in the appropriation bills, but has not been written into the Revised Statutes.

Second. It states the duties of the two assistant commissioners.

Third. It increases the number of examiners in chief from three to five. The reason for this amendment is that the board passes on appeals aggregating about 1,100 per year. This is more than three men can properly pass upon. The delay and inadequate consideration of cases which naturally follow create unnecessary further appeals with consequent expense and loss of time for applicants and a diversion of the attention of the commissioner from other useful work.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I notice here in line 16, page 2——

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman will permit, I prefer to make my statement first and then I will answer his question.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman is on the very point about which I desired to ask.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Very well; ask the question.

Mr. RAYBURN. I was just going to question the necessity of these five examiners in chief. There are three now, as I understand.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. And I am informed by folks who have to do with this department that these men are now and have been absolutely up with their work, and they question very strenuously the necessity of adding these two new examiners in chief and say that if they are not absolutely needed they would gum the work up more than to have only three when they contend that the three examiners are up with their work entirely.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Now, I will give you the statement of the commissioner in that regard. Commissioner Ewing, at the hearing before the committee, in answer to a question, made this statement:

The examiners in chief are charged with the duty of hearing appeals from the primary examiners and from the examiners on interferences. There are three of them, and there is no provision of law whereby an examiner can be assigned to sit with them; therefore if one of them is sick their work is badly handicapped. If two of them are ill, as happened about a year ago, the board is put out of business. As a matter of fact, there is ample work for five men if the work is properly done and done as thoroughly as it ought to be done, and three would make a quorum, and there would always be a body of three sitting. That is why I have asked for five examiners in chief.

Mr. RAYBURN. Just one word further. I do not notice that the commissioner states, nor is the assertion made, that they have been behind, except when two of them happened to be sick a little while. It seems to me that somebody ought to know if they are behind with their work there before it would be necessary to add these two members to that corps.

Mr. ALEXANDER. My information from the commissioner is to the effect that this increase was desired in order to facilitate the work of the department and prevent unnecessary delays. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] desire to ask me a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I simply wanted to ask a question suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

Now, I understand that the work performed by these examiners in chief is practically, if not entirely, current at the present time, taking into consideration the fact that two years ago two of these examiners were ill. If I am correctly informed, the work performed by these examiners in chief is current or as near current as it is possible to make it, taking into consideration the fact that they have to set these hearings and give lawyers who want to be heard time and opportunity to make their argument. Now, if their work is practically current, or is as nearly so as it can be, I do not see any real necessity for adding to the board and making it five instead of three. As a matter of fact, the entire board has to pass upon every single, individual case that comes before it whether you make it five or make it ten.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Under the law I suppose a majority of the board can sit and hear these cases and pass on them.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If one of these members should happen to be sick, of course it is for a limited period, and in a contested case, or where two members disagree, the case can be set over as it is in cases of appellate courts where there are only three members. But to make the board five, in order to take care of the possibility of some member being sick, seems to me is creating a force that is not needed, judging from the information I have had on the subject, and that is what I wanted the gentleman to enlighten the committee on.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I believe the gentleman is a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, before whom the commissioner appeared recently with reference to the provision for these various officers. Did the gentleman inquire of him as regards the necessity for this increase?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The commissioner made a statement, and a very strong one, in favor of having five instead of three, but, as I gather, the reason for it is the same reason as given by the gentleman now, and that is that there is a possibility that some one of these present examiners in chief may become ill or for some other reason may not be able to attend the meeting of the board, and if he had five he would always have the guaranty that at least three would be present. But I am frank to say that reason did not appeal to me very much.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Here is what the commissioner stated in his letter to the committee, reenforced by his statement before the committee. He said:

It increases the number of examiners in chief from three to five. The reason for this amendment is that the board passes upon appeals aggregating about 1,100 per year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. How many of those, if you will pardon me, are interference cases and how many of the kind that are more or less informal?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not know. He says:

This is more than three men can properly pass upon. The delay and inadequate consideration of cases which naturally follow create unnecessary further appeals, with consequent expense and loss of time to applicants and a diversion of the attention of the commissioner from other useful work.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, as I understand it, it is not proposed to create a new board, but these appeals will come before this same board, consisting of five instead of three members, if this law is passed. Now, I could see some reason for that, and really I could understand how it would expedite the work, if there were to be two boards instead of one; but under this law we have one board and five gentlemen sitting upon that board. I take it that every one of the five would insist on knowing what is in the particular case before that board, and they will insist upon investigating and knowing the facts, naturally, before they sign an opinion as members of the board. Now, I fail to see how the appointment of additional examiners in chief will serve to expedite the business before the board in disposing of these appeals.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman's argument is sound, there would be no reason for increasing the number of judges on the bench, for the reason that it is assumed, and properly so, that all judges should familiarize themselves with the record in each case. I understand that it is a fact that these chief examiners, on account of the pressure of the work, sometimes O. K. the opinions of law clerks which are presented to them and promulgate them as the opinions of the board. Now, I think that was stated by the commissioner somewhere in the hearings. I would think each examiner should examine the record for himself before writing or concurring in an opinion.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have never understood that these present examiners in chief were complaining of the work they have to do. With such a court as that to which the gentleman refers, it is always possible to relieve the members of the court of a great burden of work they have to perform. But I do not understand that to be the proposition here. It is not to relieve these three men of the work they have to do, but, as I say, to provide a quorum in case one is ill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I believe there have been delays in having these cases adjudicated. Just where the fault lies I do not know. The commissioner wishes to organize the examining corps to facilitate the work of the Patent Office and have the cases disposed of more promptly; and he regards this increase in the number of examiners in chief made as essential in order to do so.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, these three officers are presidential officers, as I understand it. If any one of these three are incapable of doing the work, or are not performing the work properly, there is a way to get at that without adding the burden of $7,000 in salaries.

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is no complaint that they are not properly performing their duties.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] stated a while ago, the answer as to whether or not they are doing their work lies in the fact that the work is current to-day, if I am correctly informed.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand, the gentleman says there are one or two of these men, assistants, who are appropriated for but not established by law?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Not of this grade.

Mr. FOSTER. I mean of these assistant commissioners—two additional examiners in chief.

Mr. ALEXANDER. None of these. The chief examiners——

Mr. FOSTER. I mean the commissioners. They are fixed by law now, are they not? If they were appropriated for last year, they are.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman refers to the two assistant commissioners, he is right; but that is not what we are talking about now. We are talking about examiners in chief.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Of course, the first assistant and assistant commissioner are already provided for. These officers have been provided for in appropriation bills, but the statute does not provide for them.

Mr. FOSTER. I call the gentleman's attention to the appropriation bill of last year, which did fix these officers as permanent.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well, we are writing the amendment into the statute now by amending the statute itself; that is all.

Mr. Chairman, the only reasons for these additional chief examiners, as stated by the commissioner, are, first, that in the absence of one of the chief examiners there is no provision of law by which another may be substituted for him; and, second, in the absence of two and the failure of a quorum, the hearing of appeals by the board would be temporarily suspended. The purpose of providing for these two additional chief examiners is to make the work more efficient and to provide for its continuance and to facilitate the disposition of these appeals and avoid delay and complaint on the part of the public; and, after hearing the Commissioner of Patents, the committee were unanimous in the opinion that these additional examiners should be provided for.

For a number of years the appropriation act has provided that the chief clerk shall be qualified to act as principal examiner, and we have simply put that provision into the statute. This is regarded as very important, because an enormous amount of mail reaching the office contains inquiries which can be answered by the chief clerk if he is thoroughly familiar with the work of the office.

Then, fifth, the librarian should be qualified to act as assistant examiner, because the library is primarily intended for use in making searches. Sixth, while there are at present two law examiners provided by the statute, they are both designed to supervise the initiation of interferences. The commissioner asks that they be increased to five, the other three being needed to do supervisory work. Two of the three have already been provided for. They were provided for in the last appropriation bill. The commissioner is asking, therefore, for one additional law examiner.

Then, seventh, the post of examiner in charge of classification work was established by the appropriation act of 1909 and has been continued ever since. There is no work of the office that is more difficult, and it is a continuing work, since the classification must always be under revision. We have simply written that into the statute. There is no increase of offices.

Eighth, the changes of salary indicated are all merely fixing salaries which have been in appropriation acts for a number of years past.

Ninth, the omission of the provision that two of the second assistant examiners shall be women is not intended to exclude them, but to remove the possible limitation upon the commissioner. Women make excellent assistant examiners, and are appointed whenever opportunity arises. The existing law says two of them may be women. That provision is simply stricken out for that reason.

Tenth, the grades of first, second, third, and fourth assistant examiners, heretofore made a part of the appropriation act, but for several years omitted—the difference being indicated only by the difference of salary—are reestablished, and the grade of fourth assistant examiner will for the first time be placed in the Revised Statutes, it having so far been carried in the appropriation act only.

Under the law there are now 63 first assistant examiners at a salary of $2,500 a year each. This bill increases the number to 86, making an increase of 23. The number of second assistant examiners under the existing law is 73. This bill increases the number by 13. Their salary is $2,100 a year. There are now 88 third assistant examiners. This bill decreases the number by 2. The salaries are $1,800 a year. There are 110 fourth assistant examiners, and we decrease the number to 86, which is a net decrease of 24. The increases are 36 and the decreases 26, making the net increase of assistant examiners 10, but the salaries in the aggregate are not disturbed. They continue or remain as under existing law. The result is that the average salary of the assistant examiners is now $1,880. The average salary of assistant examiners, if this bill is enacted into law, will be $1,950, or $70 increase per examiner. That is because there are more examiners provided for in the higher grades than heretofore, which will somewhat increase the average salary.

Of course the Patent Office is maintained by the fees paid by parties applying for patents, and the surplus revenue from this source is about $200,000 per annum. The net increase in cost under the provision of this bill will be between $54,000 and $55,000, because two of the three additional law examiners have heretofore been provided for in appropriation bills, and will be provided for, I presume, in the appropriation bill this year; and hence, if you take that from the $61,000, it will leave between $54,000 and $55,000 increase.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CANNON. What is the increased number of employees?

Mr ALEXANDER. Thirteen—10 assistant examiners, 1 law examiner, and 2 chief examiners.

Mr. CANNON. And about $60,000 increase of pay?

Mr. ALEXANDER. About $54,000 increase.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CRISP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 2520. An act granting to the State of Nevada 7,000,000 acres of land in said State for the use and benefit of the public schools of Nevada and the State university of the State of Nevada; and

S. 377. An act providing for the establishment of a term of the district court for the middle district of Tennessee at Winchester, Tenn.

REORGANIZATION IN THE PATENT OFFICE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for an hour.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill with reference to certain employees in the Patent Office, exactly similar, with the exception of five words, to the bill that was passed by the House in the last Congress and afterwards passed by the Senate without objection. Unfortunately, in the closing days of the Congress, it got mislaid somewhere on the Vice President's table or some other place, and was not sent to the President for his signature.

It makes a slight increase in the number of employees in the Patent Office, and makes some increase in the salaries by certain promotions which are authorized, by reason of increasing the number of employees of the higher grades and lessening the number of employees at the lower grades in the positions of assistant examiners.

The Patent Office is not as expensive, probably, as it ought to be. It is one of those offices which more than pays its way, because it turns into the Treasury more than we appropriate for the maintenance of the office. While that is not a sufficient reason for making an increase in the force of the office, still an increase in the patent business in the office warrants some increase in the force, and I think the fact that so many of the third or fourth assistant examiners, after a little experience in the office, resign to take places in private houses at higher salaries, may be a sufficient reason for giving a little additional inducement for assistant examiners to remain there in the Government service, after they acquire the experience, by giving them additional opportunity for promotion.

Under the existing law there are 66 first assistant examiners. This bill proposes to increase the number by 20. They draw salaries of $2,400 each.

There are now 73 second assistant examiners who draw salaries of $2,100 each. It is proposed to increase the number by 13.

There are now 88 third assistant examiners at salaries of $1,800 each, and it is proposed to reduce that number by 2.

There are now 110 fourth assistant examiners at salaries of $1,500 each, and it is proposed to reduce that number by 24, so that it would leave 86 of each of these classes, first, second, third, and fourth assistant examiners.

Of course that results in some promotions, and hence some increases in salaries, and it is a total of 10 assistant examiners over those now employed in the office.

There has been some criticism or discussion in reference to increasing the number of examiners in chief. There are now three examiners in chief drawing salaries of $3,500 each. The bill proposes to increase the number to five, and there has been some opposition to that, emanating, I think, from one or more gentlemen in the Patent Office. I myself am not competent to judge of the desirability of that; but Mr. Ewing, the Commissioner of Patents, who is a very excellent commissioner, and who has not been extravagant in his demands for increases in his office, has stated that after very full consideration of the subject he thinks it is quite necessary to increase the number of examiners in chief from three to 5, in order to expedite the business and make sure that the examiners in chief will be able to act. My understanding is, though I did not acquire that information from Mr. Ewing, that each examiner in chief takes a case and writes an opinion upon it. When that opinion is written it is passed to the other two examiners. If one of them agrees with it, he signs the opinion, and it requires the signature of two examiners to put a decision in force, the work, of course, being done primarily by the individual examiners, and it is thought that by increasing the number to five it will give a better opportunity for the different examiners to give careful consideration to the propositions which they are to decide.

Mr. HILL. I know very little about the matter, but this objection is presented to me that the increase in the number of examiners from three to five will make a large duplication of the work. The gentleman just made an explanation as to the way in which the work is done. I should like to ask this question: If it required the approval of another examiner, making two out of three to make a report effective, would it not require three out of five, and consequently is not the criticism a genuine one that it would require a great duplication of work, and would really accomplish nothing toward perfecting or improving the work of the Patent Office?

Mr. MANN. No; I do not think so; because there will be no more cases for the five to examine than there are for the three to examine, and each one who examines his case in the first instance will be able to give more consideration to it than he is now able to give, because each examiner individually will have a fewer number of cases to pass upon in the first instance. Of course, in the end each one goes theoretically over all these cases, or is supposed to.

Mr. HILL. But as a matter of fact they do not. Is not that so? As a matter of fact, the opinion of two out of three is now considered to be the opinion of the whole board, whereas if this change is made it will hereafter require three out of five to carry the opinion of the board, and consequently will create a great deal of duplication.

Mr. MANN. Why, no; I can not see how it will create any duplication. I think the fact is that when one examiner prepares his opinion it is now submitted to the other two examiners, and it requires the approval of two out of the three to put the decision into force; when if five examiners are provided for it will be submitted to all five; but that is no duplication of the work, because each one has to examine all of these cases in some way, either originally, or when an original decision is presented for approval.

Mr. HILL. Is this a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. MANN. Yes. The bill was unanimously reported in the last House and in this House. I think it was more fully considered in the last House than it has been in this, for the reason that as a rule when a matter has been very fully considered by one House or one committee or one Congress, it does not always receive as much consideration in the next, where there has been no objection raised. I myself think this bill is unobjectionable, and ought to pass.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SIMS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 95. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the United States Naval Academy, at Annapolis, Mr. Carlos Hevia y Reyes Gavilán, a citizen of Cuba.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate Senate joint resolution 81, entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the United States Naval Academy, at Annapolis, Mr. Carlos Hevia y Reyes Gavilán, a citizen of Cuba.

REORGANIZATION IN THE PATENT OFFICE.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 477 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 477. The salaries of the officers mentioned in the preceding section shall be as follows:

"The Commissioner of Patents, $5,000 a year.

"The First Assistant Commissioner of Patents, $4,500 a year.

"The Assistant Commissioner of Patents, $3,500 a year.

"Five examiners in chief, $3,500 a year each."

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "five," in line 16, on page 2, and insert the word "three."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 16, strike out the word "five" and insert the word "three."

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, if there is any dissension in the Patent Office, I know nothing whatever about it. I never was in the Patent Office in my life, and if I ever saw anyone who worked in the Patent Office I do not know it; but I have been informed by people who have business in the Patent Office that this board is up with its work as it is now constituted, having three members. I do not doubt that there are many worthy gentlemen in the Patent Office who deserve promotion if a vacancy existed, and many who would make splendid examiners if a vacancy existed on that board now. But I do not think their demands or their desires are so pressing that we should make this increase, when not even the Commissioner of Patents himself or anyone speaking for him will say that this board is not up with its work, or will say that that is a sufficient reason why we should create two new jobs at a cost of $7,000 to the Government. Of course, $7,000 is a small matter, but it is that much.

One other thing and then I am through. They argue that in case somebody upon that board gets sick, possibly two will be sick at the same time, and the board can not act. I call attention to the fact that when you increase the number of examiners upon this board, you increase the percentage of liability that some one upon that board will be sick. And if this court as it is constituted now is up with its work, you will increase the possibility of its getting behind with its work by putting two more men on the court when they all have to sit finally on every question that comes before them. I believe this is unnecessary. I do not think there has been a reason advanced here why these two examiners should be added to the board. The only argument that could be advanced that ought to influence us to increase the court is that the court is now overworked and that they need to have additional examiners to divide the work among, but this has not been shown, and I am therefore opposed to putting the Government to this additional and unnecessary expense.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation for the Patent Office is approximately $2,000,000 a year. The Patent Office turns back into the Treasury $2,200,000 a year, leaving a surplus of $200,000. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has well stated that is not a sufficient reason for increasing the appropriation in the Patent Office; but in the case of these examiners in chief being discussed there are three, and an additional assistant has been assigned to help those now doing the work. So actually four men are now performing this service, although the fourth man has not the standing or authority of the other three members. The Commissioner of Patents states that if there were five, the work would be done more thoroughly. The Patent Office is an office where the question is almost entirely one of efficiency. You could do the work there with half the men, but you could not do it efficiently. The reason for having five instead of three is to improve the service in the office. The Commissioner of Patents believes that five men are necessary, and I believe, inasmuch as he has reorganized the office and is trying to increase and improve the service of the office, his judgment ought to be accepted, and the amendment should not prevail.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, there is no man for whom I have a higher respect than the Commissioner of Patents. He is an able and exceedingly capable official, but merely because the Commissioner of Patents makes the statement that he believes the work can be done more thoroughly by five rather than three examiners in chief, I must confess does not appeal very strongly to me. Unless the Commissioner of Patents or some one representing him can show that increasing the number of chief examiners from three to five will secure more efficient work, it seems to me that this increase should not be made. It has been stated, and I have not heard it denied, that this work is current and up to date at this time. If that be true, I fail to see why it is necessary to add $7,000 to the expense of the Government merely to provide for a contingency in case of sickness.

Mr. CARTER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Massachusetts. The Commissioner of Patents said there were 2,000 cases now pending. That does not seem to me to support the statement that they are up with their work.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman in charge of this bill a while ago made the statement that this board passes upon appeals aggregating a thousand a year.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Eleven hundred.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. How many appeals have they during the year?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am not able to inform the gentleman as to the number.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am informed that it is the number of applications to which the gentleman from Massachusetts refers and not the appeals that are taken to the examiners. There are two classes of appeals, and, if my memory is correct, there are less than 200 appeals in interference cases, and that constitutes the bulk of the work for the examiners in chief. I repeat that I have not heard a statement made, either here or before the committee, showing that the work performed by the examiners in chief is not now practically up to date. The work is as current as it is possible for a board of that kind to make it current.

Mr. KENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. KENT. In what way will there be any greater expedition in the service if this board has five chief examiners instead of three?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not able to see why five men can more expeditiously decide cases than three under their rules of procedure. As a matter of fact, as the gentleman from Texas said a moment ago, it would really serve to delay the work rather than to expedite it, for the reason that all of the members of this appellate court in the Patent Office necessarily must examine these cases. They must necessarily look into them. I can not see, since no new board is to be appointed, how five instead of three will expedite the business.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Why not have three judges of the Supreme Court of the United States? Why is it necessary to have nine judges to facilitate the transaction of business of the court or add to the efficiency of the tribunal? Yet we know that in the United States court and in the several States we have increased the number of judges in order to increase the efficiency and dispatch the work. I am told that in this department the law clerks prepare the cases and present them to the board, and in many cases they are O. K'd and go out as the opinion of the board. That may or may not be true; but there ought to be enough examiners in chief, so that the work can be properly transacted.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I venture the opinion that if we establish a board of five examiners in chief instead of three we will have the same practice of the law clerks looking into the questions that may be before the board. Now, with reference to the Supreme Court of the United States or of the supreme courts in the States, in those cases the number of judges was increased because the judges complained that they were overworked, that they could not dispatch the business before the court and were unable to give proper consideration to the cases before them. But this is not a case, so far as I have heard, of anybody on this board being overworked. It is not a case where the examiners in chief are unable to dispose of the business which comes before the board in due time and proper course.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Something has been said here with reference to the amount of money paid in by the Patent Office in excess of the cost of the office. The gentleman from New York stated probably $200,000; but I submit that is not a satisfactory argument for increasing the expenses of the office, unless they are absolutely needed. This bill proposes to increase the expenses of the Patent Office by $61,000, as shown by the report submitted by the committee. I am not prepared to say that these other increases are not necessary and are not proper; but it does seem to me that here is one case, in view of all the facts and in view of the failure to show any necessity for it, where $7,000 of that $61,000 may be saved to the Government without any detriment to the service being rendered by the Patent Office. The Patent Commissioner, for whom, as I say, I have the highest regard, who is administering his office in such a splendid and efficient manner, states that there is a way by which the revenues derived from the Patent Office may be increased by $125,000, in addition to the sum now paid in, and that is by revising the fees so as to provide for a $20 fee with the filing of an application and $15 for the final fee, whereas it is now $15 for the filing and $20 for the final. I simply make that suggestion to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] because it came out in the hearings before a subcommittee of which I am a member, and I hope the Committee on Patents will take that matter up and see if the law can not be amended in accordance with the views of the commissioner.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I do not object to the increase of the salary of the assistant examiners. If they are not worth $1,880 a year, they have no business to be there.

Mr. ALEXANDER. There are no increases provided for.

Mr. HILL. I do not object to the $7,000 additional for the chief examiners, but the criticism which comes to me and which impresses itself upon me, Mr. Chairman, is that five men who are to do the work which three now do, requiring at least a majority of the board, however it may be constituted, will increase and delay the continuance of the work in the future. I believe it would be a great deal wiser—and, if left to the board itself, that they would vote for it—if their salaries should be increased from $500 to $1,000 each and the number continued as it is, at three. So believing, I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ALEXANDER) there were—ayes 22, noes 44.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD of January 29.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 900 and had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BIDS FOR BATTLESHIPS "43" AND "44."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of the Navy giving information relative to the bids on the battleships 43 and 44, in pursuance of a statement I made the other day in response to an inquiry whether I would furnish them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the letter referred to from the Secretary of the Navy. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ARMY AND NAVY MEDAL OF HONOR HONOR ROLL.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the next committee.

The Clerk called the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I call up the bill (H. R. 4701) to establish in the War Department and in the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the Army and Navy medal of honor honor roll, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri calls up the bill H. R. 4701, to establish an Army and Navy medal of honor honor roll, which is on the Union Calendar, and asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4701, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4701), which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4701) to establish in the War Department and in the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the Army and Navy medal of honor honor roll, and for other purposes.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this is a short bill, and I think it ought to be read for the information of Members.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby established in the War Department and Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as "the Army and Navy medal of honor honor roll." Upon written application made to the Secretary of the proper department, and subject to the conditions and requirements hereinafter contained, the name of each surviving person who has served in the military or naval service of the United States in any war, who has attained or shall attain the age of 65 years, and who has been awarded a medal of honor for having in action involving actual conflict with an enemy distinguished himself conspicuously by gallantry or intrepidity, at the risk of his life, above and beyond the call of duty, and who was honorably discharged from service by muster out, resignation, or otherwise, shall be, by the Secretary of the proper department, entered and recorded on said roll. Applications for entry on said roll shall be made in such form and under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the War Department and Navy Department, respectively, and proper blanks and instructions shall be, by the proper Secretary, furnished without charge upon request made by any person claiming the benefits of this act.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War and of the Secretary of the Navy to carry this act into effect and to decide whether each applicant under this act in his department is entitled to the benefit of this act. This act and the evidence in favor of each claimant's claim shall be liberally and favorably construed in favor of the applicant, and in cases of doubt the applicant shall be given the benefit of the doubt. If the official award of the medal of honor to the applicant, or the official notice to him thereof, shall appear to show that the medal of honor was awarded to the applicant for such an act as is required by the provisions of this act, it shall be deemed sufficient to entitle the applicant to such special pension without further investigation. Otherwise all official correspondence, orders, reports, recommendations, requests, and other evidence now on file in any public office or department shall be considered, and it shall be liberally construed and considered in favor of the applicant as aforesaid and without regard to technical requirements; but no evidence not now on file as aforesaid shall be admitted or considered. A certificate of service and of the act of heroism, gallantry, bravery, or intrepidity for which the medal of honor was awarded, and of enrollment under this act, and of the right of the special pensioner to be entitled to and to receive the special pension herein granted, shall be furnished each person whose name shall be so entered on said roll. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall deliver to the Commissioner of Pensions a certified copy of each of such of said certificates as he may issue, as aforesaid, and the same shall be full and sufficient authority to the Commissioner of Pensions for the payment by him to the beneficiary named in each such certificate the special pension herein provided for.

SEC. 3. That each such surviving person whose name shall have been entered on said roll in accordance with this act shall be entitled to and shall receive and be paid by the Commissioner of Pensions in the Department of the Interior, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, a special pension of $10 per month for life, payable quarter yearly. The Commissioner of Pensions shall make all necessary rules and regulations for making payment of such special pensions to the beneficiaries thereof.

Such special pension shall begin on the day that such person shall file his application for enrollment on said roll in the office of the Secretary of War or of the Secretary of the Navy after the passage and approval of this act, and shall continue during the life of the beneficiary.

Such special pension shall not deprive any such special pensioner of any other pension or of any benefit, right, or privilege to which he is or may hereafter be entitled under any existing or subsequent law, but shall be in addition thereto.

The special pension allowed under this act shall not be subject to any attachment, execution, levy, tax, lien, or detention under any process whatever.

SEC. 4. That in case any person has been awarded two or more medals of honor, he shall not be entitled to and shall not receive more than one such special pension.

Rank in the service shall not be considered in applications filed hereunder.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, this bill was introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD], but at his request I have called it up for him. At the last session of Congress this bill was favorably reported by the House Committee on Invalid Pensions and was upon the calendar. It was also favorably reported by the Committee on Pensions in the Senate and was upon the calendar, but was not considered by either body. This bill provides for an Army and Navy medal of honor roll to be selected upon examination of those who can qualify under this act under regulations provided by the Secretary of the Navy and Secretary of War. From the best investigation we were able to make about two years ago it was found that there would be only about 100 of those now upon the roll of honor under the law who could qualify under this act, and if so, the pension provided for in this bill of $10 per month would amount to about $12,000 per annum and that, I think, would be about the total cost of the bill if it should be passed. I will now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] that he may more fully explain the provisions of the bill and state the reasons why it should be enacted.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, as has already been stated, this bill was unanimously reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions last year and went on the calendar. This bill only applies to soldiers of past wars including Indian wars, the Civil War, and the Spanish-American War. There have been issued since the organization of the Government about three thousand some two hundred medals of honor. Now, this bill provides that in order to obtain this medal of honor the applicant must have distinguished himself by gallantry and intrepedity beyond the call of duty in the presence of the enemy in actual conflict with the enemy. There are about 101 soldiers living who would be entitled to this medal of honor. There have been issued, as I said before, over 3,000, and let me illustrate: A whole regiment during the engagement at Gettysburg were doing duty in the city of Washington and were awarded medals of honor under the provisions of existing law. The soldiers who escorted the remains of Abraham Lincoln from Washington to his final burial place in the State of Illinois were issued medals of honor.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that all the members of the regiment performing duty at Washington were awarded medals of honor?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Of one regiment.

Mr. STAFFORD. That the entire membership of that regiment were awarded medals of honor?

Mr. SHERWOOD. That is what I understand. I understand the reason for that was this: Of course they were 70 miles away from that engagement, but their time was up, and because they agreed to serve after their time was up they were awarded these medals of honor.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was not by any special act, but by departmental authorization under existing law?

Mr. SHERWOOD. At that time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the House what is the existing law as to the awarding of medals of honor?

Mr. SHERWOOD. The law has been so variously interpreted by the different departments that it would be very difficult to answer that question. I am only speaking now of this bill. I do not want to say that heretofore medals of honor have been issued to unworthy soldiers, and I am only going to say this, that none of those soldiers mentioned could obtain medals of honor under this bill. The late Senator from Alabama, Senator Johnston, and the Representative from Virginia, Mr. HAY, have introduced bills similar to this to take care of future wars. Now, I will give you an illustration of soldiers who would be entitled to medals of honor under this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit there? Do the bills referred to also provide a pension of $10 per month to those who are awarded medals of honor?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Yes; $10 a month.

Mr. STAFFORD. The other bills referred to carry a pension?

Mr. SHERWOOD. To illustrate: The Legion of Honor of France, the Victoria Cross of Great Britain, the Iron Cross of Germany, and, I believe, every decoration of every country in the Old World awarding medals of honor carry pensions, and it is on the basis of all the medals of honor that have been issued in all countries of the Old World that we make this very low pension.

It has been said before our committee in the hearing that I would be entitled to a medal of honor under this bill; but I would say, as I said when the dollar-a-day pension bill was pending when it was claimed that I would get the largest pension of any soldier in the United States under that bill—I said that I would never apply for a pension under the bill and never accept it; and I will say the same now. [Applause.] I would not apply for a pension and would not accept it, although I could get a medal of honor on six different occasions during the war. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERWOOD. I will.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman is entitled to go on the medal-of-honor roll, would not he ask to do that?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Well, I do not say I would not go on the medal-of-honor roll, but I would not accept a pension.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman could not help it.

Mr. SHERWOOD. That would be a matter up to the Secretary of War by orders from the War Department.

Mr. MANN. They would have to send the gentleman a pension check every quarter, whether he accepted it or not. Of course the gentleman could return it.

Mr. SHERWOOD. No; never until I applied for it. Now, I will give you an illustration of a soldier who would be entitled to a medal of honor under this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Before the gentleman proceeds, will he explain what the practice is of other countries in awarding pensions to those who have been placed on their rolls of honor?

Mr. SHERWOOD. I have that down in my office. I did not know that this matter was coming up. But they award very large pensions, comparatively. Different countries award different pensions—some of them are munificent ones—under those medals of honor. In the Franco-Prussian War the old Kaiser issued medals of honor to 40,000 soldiers, and that war lasted only seven months. In this war in Europe, according to an article in Munsey's Magazine for February, the Kaiser has issued nearly 500,000 of the iron crosses to his soldiers. The number of medals that have been issued by England and by France I have been unable to ascertain.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do those awards of the iron cross by the Kaiser and those medals awarded in Great Britain carry with them a pension?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Certainly they do.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was not aware of that fact.

Mr. DYER. And big ones, too.

Mr. SHERWOOD. The iron cross is not continuous. It has to be revived in every war. It has been revived in this war.

Now, I was going to give you an illustration. For instance, at the Battle of Chickamauga, when Thomas's right was threatened and was really demoralized, Gen. James D. Stedman, in the rear, who was commanding a division of volunteers, voluntarily marched to the support of Gen. Thomas. When they encountered that terrific fire and the line wavered, Gen. Stedman snatched the colors from the color bearer of an Illinois regiment and led that line into battle. He was riding a horse that had been captured from Gen. Zollicoffer at the Battle of Mill Springs. His horse was shot, he was thrown over his head, and his right hand was lacerated. He was stunned, but he still remained on that field and maintained that line. And during a lull in the battle he visited the "Rock of Chickamauga," Gen. "Pap" Thomas, who took his bloody hand and said to him, "Gen. Stedman, you have saved my army."

That is one case where a man would get a medal of honor. [Applause.]

Again, at the Battle of Atlanta, on the 22d of July, 1864, I was in a position where I could see the whole movement. After Gen. McPherson was killed, when his line had become demoralized before his death, it was Gen. John A. Logan, of Illinois—and I saw him make that ride on his war horse "Blackjack"—who rallied the staggering battalions of that army and saved the day. He would be entitled to a medal of honor under this bill. [Applause.]

Again, at the Battle of Franklin, there was not a horse alive on the whole line on our side after the battle. There were 12 Confederate generals that marched abreast the battle line just before our line was reached. Gen. Pat Cleburne rode diagonally across the line between the hostile armies. Of course his horse was shot, and he was pierced perhaps by 40 Minié bullets. If he had been alive, he would have been entitled to a medal of honor.

The late Gen. George W. Gordon, of Tennessee, was captured on my immediate left at Franklin, right in front of the works, and was pulled over the works, wounded in that awful charge, and taken prisoner. Gen. Cockrell, of Missouri, who died a few days ago, was wounded on the front line, in front of my command, at the famous Locust Grove. He would be entitled to a medal of honor under this bill. [Applause.]

We have sifted down, and we find about 101 soldiers, all told, who would be entitled to this medal of honor under this bill, at a cost of about $12,200. The cost is merely insignificant. I think it is an incentive in case of a future war to know that the Congress of the United States has recognized valor and gallantry on fields of battle.

That is all I care to say now. [Applause.]

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves 45 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, undoubtedly it is not difficult to find or recite innumerable instances of valor and bravery in battle or in war, or, for that matter, in private life and in peaceful pursuits.

I shall not vote for this bill myself. I do not think there is any occasion for it. I think the main purpose of it is to pay an additional pension to a small number of men who, if they have individually good cases, could easily get the pension provided by a special act of Congress. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD], whom we all revere and love, and whom all of us hesitate to oppose on any matters relating to the old soldier boys, stated that there are about 101 persons who would be affected by this bill. It draws the line pretty close when you say "about 101." I could understand "about 100," but "about 101" is very definite and particularly definite in view of the provisions of the bill, because the bill itself assumes that no one can tell how many persons will be affected by it. I will read from the language of the bill:

This act and the evidence in favor of each claimant's claim shall be liberally and favorably construed in favor of the applicant, and in cases of doubt the applicant shall be given the benefit of the doubt.

That looks as though no one could tell. Even if you say that the evidence shall be "favorably" considered, that is a direction to a court that seems rather queer.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I am going to offer an amendment to strike out the word "favorably."

Mr. MANN. I am glad I have produced that result thus far. It is not reported by the committee to strike out.

Then they go ahead and say that certain things:

Shall be deemed sufficient to entitle the applicant to such special pension without further investigation.

And then follows:

Otherwise all official correspondence, orders, reports, recommendations, requests, and other evidence now on file in any public office, etc., shall be considered.

It is very evident from this language in the bill that the gentleman who construed the bill did not anticipate that anyone could say how many people might be affected by it, although the distinguished chairman of the committee thinks it would affect only about 101. I do not think anybody can tell how many would be affected. There were innumerable instances of valor on both sides in the Civil War. There are innumerable instances of valor in every war, but I do not believe that that is the reason why now we should pay an additional pension to those who performed those acts of valor, unless we act upon the cases individually. No one can know after all this length of time what particular cases ought to be acted upon, except as we give them the opportunity to present the case. And then we say that the evidence shall be liberally construed, even if you strike out the word "favorably."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman inform the committee what his construction is of the language in line 11 on the first page and at the top of page 2, reading:

And who has been awarded a medal of honor for having in action involving actual conflict with an enemy distinguished himself conspicuously by gallantry or intrepidity—

And so forth.

That does not say that a medal of honor shall have been awarded by the Government or who awarded it. He may have gotten the medal of honor from any source. What does that mean?

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not know just what the term "awarded a medal of honor" means. They constantly give medals to soldiers which they call "congressional medals of honor," and people are thereby led to believe that it is because Congress has especially provided in some case that a medal of honor shall be granted, or a congressional medal.

But that is not the case at all. There may be, and probably is, some provision of law lost in the statute books, but resurrected for the purpose, and properly, which authorizes the granting of congressional medals for valor in war. I do not desire to make any objection to that. I think the number of congressional medals which have been granted is very large indeed, much larger in some cases than the facts warranted. It was not by special acts of Congress, although they are called "congressional medals," granted supposedly for special services.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. TILSON. Has the gentleman noted the language, "above and beyond the call of duty"? Does the gentleman understand what is meant in the bill by the words "above and beyond the call of duty"?

Mr. MANN. I do not understand, but that is a matter to be construed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman finished his answer?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman look at the language on line 5 of the first page, "the Army and Navy medal of honor honor roll"? Would not that raise a very serious question as to the honor of those who would not come upon the "honor honor roll"? That is to say, would we not be dealing unfairly with men who held medals of honor which they worthily won if we should differentiate between those men and those who might be selected for this "honor honor roll"?

Mr. MANN. Well, if there is a small number now, it seems to me a very unjust discrimination to grant this privilege now to those who remain as against those who have passed away. To hold a medal of honor is principally valuable to hand down to one's descendants, but here is a proposition that proposes to place a small number now on a medal of honor roll which will not contain the names of Gen. John A. Logan or the other brave men to whom my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] has referred. They are all dead and gone. They can not have their names placed upon this medal of honor honor roll, and in the future it will be said, if this bill be passed, that this small number of men were the men who received the honor of being placed on the medal of honor honor roll, while the larger number, who mainly performed the feats of valor, will never have the distinction of having their names on the roll.

Many of us, not myself, still take great delight in what our ancestors did in the Revolutionary War or the War of 1812, or other wars of that character in the early days, and in the Indian wars. Children or descendants of our children a hundred years from now, some of them, may point with great pride, if this bill be passed, to the fact that their ancestor was upon the medal of honor roll, while the children or descendants of one who performed a much greater feat of valor will not have that honor or distinction. A hundred years from now, if this bill be passed, there will be a national society incorporated of descendants of those who in the Civil War were entitled to be placed upon the medal of honor roll, but the great number of people who received a medal of honor will not be on the roll.

However, I do not know whether it is possible to stop any sentimental proposition of this sort which gets into this House. We are unduly influenced at times by sentiment, and sometimes probably not sufficiently influenced. But when it comes to the giving of something where you vote upon it in the House with sentiment attached, it always or almost always goes through. But it is not fair to those who have passed away; I do not think it is fair to those who are living, to say that we propose to give them pay in money for the valor and the valorous deeds which they exhibited. These men were glad and proud to receive the medal of honor which they have received. They were glad and proud to perform the service which they rendered; and now some one is trying to place it upon a financial basis, that we pay this in money. They are paid in the pride of what they did. They do not ask or deserve to be relegated to the idea of performing the feats in order to receive a few paltry extra dollars. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend on line 9——

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. We have not reached that point yet.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I will move to amend when we reach it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, as the son of an ex-Confederate soldier I want to ask the Members from the South to vote for this measure. [Applause.] I am pleased by the feeling reference that the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] made to the chivalrous Pat Cleburne, a Confederate general from Arkansas. I think the time has come when the North and South should shake hands across the border. [Applause.]

Give the brave men who have earned this distinction the small pension and the medal contemplated by this measure. As far as the southern soldier is concerned, the only medal he has received is the medal of scars. [Applause.] But he should receive something more.

Later in the session I want to ask the indulgence of the House and the patient hearing of the gentlemen on that side of the Chamber to the bill which I had the honor to introduce on the 6th of December providing pensions for Confederate soldiers. For the first time in the history of the House a serious effort will be made to pass a bill of this kind. I want to give my reasons in a perfectly serious way at the proper time why I think that bill should pass.

I see no reason why the paltry financial aid carried in this bill should not be extended to the veterans entitled to it. I hope this bill will pass without a dissenting vote from the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the Chamber.

I merely wanted to state my position with reference to this measure. The time has come when the whole country should lay aside the bitter sectional feeling that existed years ago growing out of the Civil War.

Mr. KONOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. KONOP. Will there not be many cases, where deeds of valor were performed by privates, that will not come in under this bill?

Mr. TILLMAN. I think that is true; but no soldier who does not merit the medal will be placed upon this roll of honor.

Mr. KONOP. I think every northern soldier who was brave enough to obey the command of his superior officer and march forth to battle or to a charge ought to be put on that roll, and I do not think there ought to be any special legislation of this kind. I think that those who, as citizens of the country that they loved, fought to save it should have every honor, and I do not think that any few of them ought to be selected and given any special honor. [Applause.]

Mr. TILLMAN. I think a man who specially distinguished himself by a rare exhibition of courage is entitled to more credit than a man who did not do so. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FERRIS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

H. R. 8233. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Republic Iron & Steel Co. to construct a bridge across the Mahoning River, in the State of Ohio;

H. R. 9224. An act providing for an increase in number of midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy; and

H. J. Res. 98. Joint resolution making part of the appropriation "Construction and machinery, increase of the Navy," in the naval act approved March 3, 1915, available for the extension of building ways and equipment at the navy yards at New York and Mare Island, Cal.

ARMY AND NAVY MEDAL OF HONOR HONOR ROLL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby established in the War Department and Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as "the Army and Navy medal of honor honor roll." Upon written application made to the Secretary of the proper department, and subject to the conditions and requirements hereinafter contained, the name of each surviving person who has served in the military or naval service of the United States in any war, who has attained or shall attain the age of 65 years, and who has been awarded a medal of honor for having in action involving actual conflict with an enemy distinguished himself conspicuously by gallantry or intrepedity, at the risk of his life, above and beyond the call of duty, and who was honorably discharged from service by muster out, resignation, or otherwise, shall be, by the Secretary of the proper department, entered and recorded on said roll. Applications for entry on said roll shall be made in such form and under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the War Department and Navy Department, respectively, and proper blanks and instructions shall be, by the proper Secretary, furnished without charge upon request made by any person claiming the benefits of this act.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "honor" before the word "roll," in line 5, page 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the word "honor" before the word "roll."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is agreed to, the line will read "Army and Navy medal of honor roll," rather than "Army and Navy medal of honor honor roll."

I offer this amendment because to use the word "honor" as it is used here twice will unjustly and unfairly discriminate as between medal of honor men. There are many of them living, and as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has indicated, many medal of honor men have long since died. To raise a question as between those who are now entitled to the standing of medal of honor men would, it seems to me, be unfortunate. We would at once make it appear that one man holding a badge of honor was not as much entitled to it as another man holding a badge of honor. By striking out the second "honor," as proposed in my amendment, we will create a medal of honor roll, rather than a "medal of honor honor roll." That means the law granting a special pension or special honor to certain men whose services were specially distinguished will not be affected at all, but, at least so far as the law is concerned, we will not undertake to underestimate the services of those men who creditably and honorably hold medals of honor.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, personally I would have no objection to that word being stricken out. When the committee was before our committee we asked them about the necessity for that. As I understand, this is to be an honor roll within the other honor roll, and if the second word "honor" should be stricken out, then the bill would include all those who have been placed on the honor roll. The purpose of this bill was to place upon a special honor roll within the general honor roll certain men who by reason of distinguished bravery in the presence of the enemy had gone far beyond the call of duty and exhibited extraordinary bravery in battle.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand that this makes a wheel within a wheel, as it were.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is to say, one man having distinguished himself for bravery upon the field of battle, and having received the medal of honor, would to a certain extent be discredited, because he could not enter this new circle of medal of honor men created by this bill. It seems to me that would be very unfortunate.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. The gentleman heard the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, Gen. SHERWOOD, that there were an entire regiment in the city of Washington during the Battle of Gettysburg who were placed upon this honor roll.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Does not the gentleman think there should be some distinction between the members of that regiment, who were not in the presence of the enemy at all, who were placed upon that roll, and the other men that he referred to, who distinguished themselves by bravery in the presence of the enemy? Is there not some reason for that distinction?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If that entire regiment could qualify under the conditions imposed by this act I would say to the gentleman that there might then be reason for creating a separate roll; but that entire regiment could not qualify as this bill provides, and therefore the bill would properly protect the men whom the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] desires especially to protect and honor in this instance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri) there were—ayes 16, noes 34.

Accordingly the motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War and of the Secretary of the Navy to carry this act into effect and to decide whether each applicant, under this act, in his department is entitled to the benefit of this act. This act and the evidence in favor of each claimant's claim shall be liberally and favorably construed in favor of the applicant, and in cases of doubt the applicant shall be given the benefit of the doubt. If the official award of the medal of honor to the applicant, or the official notice to him thereof, shall appear to show that the medal of honor was awarded to the applicant for such an act as is required by the provisions of this act, it shall be deemed sufficient to entitle the applicant to such special pension without further investigation. Otherwise all official correspondence, orders, reports, recommendations, requests, and other evidence now on file in any public office or department shall be considered, and it shall be liberally construed and considered in favor of the applicant as aforesaid and without regard to technical requirements; but no evidence not now on file, as aforesaid, shall be admitted or considered. A certificate of service and of the act of heroism, gallantry, bravery, or intrepidity for which the medal of honor was awarded, and of enrollment under this act, and of the right of the special pensioner to be entitled to and to receive the special pension herein granted, shall be furnished each person whose name shall be so entered on said roll. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall deliver to the Commissioner of Pensions a certified copy of each of such of said certificates as he may issue, as aforesaid, and the same shall be full and sufficient authority to the Commissioner of Pensions for the payment by him to the beneficiary named in each such certificate the special pension herein provided for.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, at the request of the chairman of the committee, I offer an amendment to strike out the words "and favorably," in line 19, page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 19, strike out the words "and favorably."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, at the request of the chairman of the committee, I offer the following amendment: Strike out the language beginning with the word "but," in line 7, and ending with the word "considered," in line 8.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, lines 7 and 8, strike out the following language: "but no evidence now on file, as aforesaid, shall be admitted or considered."

Mr. MANN. Suppose that language goes out, the gentleman would want to modify his statement that there are about 101 who would be benefited by this act.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I did not make that statement.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I said about 100.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say about 101. I may have misunderstood him.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I may be mistaken myself, but I think not.

Mr. MANN. If you take that language out, it will change the number very much.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. It will admit other testimony; what the effect will be I can not say.

Mr. MANN. That of itself is an admission that no one can tell how many will be affected by it.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I think it is indefinite, but the best judgment we could get from the authorities was that the number would be about 100.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. In estimating that there would be 100 men placed on the roll under this bill, the department based its estimate on the fact that the evidence was now in the department.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I can not say upon what they based it. Of course, under this bill no one could be placed on this roll that had not distinguished himself for extraordinary bravery in the presence of the enemy, and he must be 65 years of age and must have distinguished himself by going beyond the requirements of his duty.

Mr. BOOHER. But by striking this out you permit the applicant to introduce any testimony he pleases, not record evidence, but his affidavit and the affidavit of others, and there is no telling how many he will place on the roll.

Mr. SHERWOOD. The estimate was based upon the number now on the rolls and the number that would be entitled to medal of honor under this bill. Then we took the number of deaths up to last September and estimated how many would be alive entitled to this medal of honor when it shall have passed.

Mr. BOOHER. Does the gentleman think that they ought to permit evidence to be introduced indiscriminately?

Mr. SHERWOOD. We ought to allow men who have evidence to file it.

Mr. BOOHER. If the amendment is adopted, it will open the door to all kinds of evidence. I think that clause ought to remain in the bill.

Mr. SHERWOOD. The Secretary of War will scrutinize the evidence very carefully.

Mr. BOOHER. If the bill is to pass, I think that clause should remain in it. The cases ought to be confined to where the evidence is now in the possession of the department.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman from Missouri will look at paragraph 1, he will find that the whole matter of submitting evidence is to be left to the rules and regulations prescribed by the War and Navy Departments.

Mr. BOOHER. If this clause remains in the bill, they will have to take the evidence now on file; but if you strike the clause out, any kind of evidence can be introduced, and the department must consider it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The clause says "no evidence not now on file shall be admitted or considered." The presumption is that, 50 years having elapsed since the Civil War, the department has in its possession full information, and no new evidence can be adduced.

Mr. BOOHER. If you strike the language out, any kind of evidence can be introduced.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Take the Battle of Franklin as an illustration. Here is an order issued by the commanding general complimenting a soldier for gallantry in that charge. He distinguished himself for gallantry over and above the line of duty. That order was put in the mail to go to the War Office, but was destroyed and never got there. If that evidence is now available, and that fact can be demonstrated, why should that soldier be excluded from filing his evidence?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri) there were 29 ayes and 8 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 3, beginning with line 4, the words "and it shall be liberally construed and considered in favor of the applicant as aforesaid and without regard to technical requirements."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, beginning with line 4, strike out the following language: "And it shall be liberally construed and considered in favor of the applicant as aforesaid and without regard to technical requirements."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Ohio, in presenting the matter, to say that he intended to offer an amendment of this kind. It ought to be adopted, because in the first paragraph of the bill we have provided what qualifications a man shall have who applies for special consideration, he being a medal of honor man. We have assigned to the War and Navy Departments the duty of preparing rules and regulations governing evidence.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that there is no objection to his amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not think that the gentleman wanted to prejudge the claim, as this first paragraph would do.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in view of the acceptance of that amendment, I offer another, which I think the committee will accept, to strike out, on page 2, beginning with line 18, the words:

This act and the evidence in favor of each claimant's claim shall be liberally and favorably construed in favor of the applicant, and in cases of doubt the applicant shall be given the benefit of the doubt.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 17, strike out the following language: "This act and the evidence in favor of each claimant's claim shall be liberally and favorably construed in favor of the applicant, and in cases of doubt the applicant shall be given the benefit of the doubt."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, we do not object to that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The committee does not object to the striking of this out?

Mr. SHERWOOD. No.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I object to the provision being stricken out. I object to anything further being done to this bill, if we expect to pass it, which will make it difficult for anybody entitled to obtain benefits under its provisions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think if the gentleman had listened to me he would have better understood the purport of this amendment. The first section provides how the applicants shall apply and imposes the qualifications. It also provides that the two Departments of War and Navy shall provide regulations. Everything has been done in the bill that gives the applicant the right to distinguish himself from other medal of honor men, except that in these two paragraphs, one of which has just been stricken out——

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I refuse to yield further. My point is this. We are reducing the provisions of this bill so far as they may relate to the private soldier, one of whom I have specially in mind who had an ambition to obtain one of these medals of honor. When he made his application at the department he was given to understand that the evidence was not there to warrant his request, and because it was not on file, because it was not a matter of record, he was therefore not entitled to it. The door was closed to him in his efforts to obtain this medal.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. If there is any virtue in this bill at all, it ought to be so thoroughly liberalized that every one of the hundreds of thousands of private soldiers of the Union Army who live to-day shall have the right and opportunity, not only to make this application, but to use whatever evidence there is on file in the department, and in addition then to obtain evidence from his comrades or from whatever source he may, and further have the benefit of it throughout its introduction, its construction, and determination so liberally construed, that he will have fair opportunity to establish his claim.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We have just voted out of the bill this provision:

But no evidence not now on file as aforesaid shall be admitted or considered.

Mr. SLOAN. I understand that no outside evidence can come in.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, yes, it can. That is the very point. The amendment the gentleman is discussing is an amendment which prejudges the case. We ought to leave the department some discretion.

Mr. SLOAN. If we are going to have this, I would be glad to have it prejudged in favor of most of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out of section 2 the language contained in the last sentence of that section on page 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 14, after the word "roll," strike out the following: "The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall deliver to the Commissioner of Pensions a certified copy of each of such of said certificates as he may issue, as aforesaid, and the same shall be full and sufficient authority to the Commissioner of Pensions for the payment by him to the beneficiary named in each such certificate the special pension herein provided for."

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I thoroughly agree with the gentleman from Illinois that placing a man's name on a roll of honor, that roll being kept in the War or the Navy Departments, is a sufficient reward above his other comrades, who probably would have performed the same feat if the opportunity had been presented to them. Why give the man $10 pension extra? Why say, in addition to keeping his name on a roll of honor, always open to the inspection of everyone, that in addition thereto we will add to his pension $10 a month above those received by men who suffered just as great hardships as he did during the war? I am in favor of a roll of honor, but I am not in favor of making a roll of honor to be assured by dollars and cents in the shape of a pension. I believe that the roll of honor is enough within itself when he gets the same pension as his comrades get for like service without this addition. I hope the amendment to strike out all reference to pensions in this bill will be sustained.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, of course the effect of this will be to strike out the pension of $10 a month that this bill carries to this roll of honor that is proposed to be composed of about 100 men, and, if we are correctly informed by the authorities, is to cost the Government approximately $12,000 a year.

Now, of course, this strikes at the very life of the bill. If the committee desires to strike it out they have the right to do so, but this is a very insignificant amount of money to be paid to men who have exhibited extraordinary bravery in the presence of the enemy on the field of battle. This bill requires they must have gone not as far as their duty called them to go, but beyond the call of duty in the service of their country. I think this amendment ought not to be adopted.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, here we are discussing a bill for an appropriation of about $12,000 for the most gallant and intrepid men in the service at a lower pension than any country around the world pays for medal-of-honor heroes. I was on the floor of this House when the appropriation went through for $400,000 in three minutes to suppress the hog cholera. I believe God made man erect with head and heart above his belly and that that kind of a human being is entitled to more consideration than the unthinking hog, whose head is on a level with his belly. [Applause.]

Mr. KONOP. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That each such surviving person whose name shall have been entered on said roll in accordance with this act shall be entitled to and shall receive and be paid by the Commissioner of Pensions in the Department of the Interior, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, a special pension of $10 per month for life, payable quarter-yearly. The Commissioner of Pensions shall make all necessary rules and regulations for making payment of such special pensions to the beneficiaries thereof.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like recognition to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, the gentleman in charge of the bill, if they would view with favor an amendment looking toward the raising of that $10, which looks pitiably small and insignificant to me. I do not want to be foolish enough to try to increase it, if the matter has been carefully considered by the committee.

Mr. SHERWOOD. What is the amendment?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. A proposition to increase the amount from $10 to $18 a month. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the figures "$10," in line 1, page 4, and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$18."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 1, strike out the figures "$10" and insert in lieu thereof "$18."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, in all seriousness I offer this amendment. I have been pleased beyond that which I ordinarily feel in the way of pleasure by the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD], in charge of the bill, to-day calling attention to specific instances in which these medals of honor could be granted and membership upon this roll attained. While I do not believe we should in general exalt deeds in time of war above the deeds of our citizenry in time of peace, yet there do come critical moments when the heart and nerve of the soldier must rise supreme over every consideration if the Nation he serves is going to be saved. It is not that this man or that man is willing to risk his life, the happiness of his family, and his children and his future that his country may be benefited or saved. It is something a little beyond that. When you combine those qualities of heart and courage with that intellectual keenness, that quickness of judgment, that exaltation of soul that literally lifts mind above matter, lifts a man to the highest point he ever reaches, then heroism and achievement are combined and should be recognized. This combination must exist in order that membership on this roll of honor may be secured. Not every brave man combines the other qualities essential to necessary achievement under this act. When, however, the qualities of heart and mind are present, and the deed—heroism—is performed, I think this Nation, the greatest and richest in the world, can well afford to recognize such achievement and patriotism beyond $10 a month—less than the amount we pay to widows to-day. A man must be 65 years old before he can enjoy the benefits of this act——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. In a moment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is on the amount. Of course, the gentleman understands this is in excess of existing pensions?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I understand that thoroughly. But this is supposed to be in direct consideration of what he has done, in direct recognition of the merits of his achievement. As I was saying to you, a man must have attained the age of 65 years before he can enjoy any of the benefits of this act, and if he has lived through the hours that made possible his heroism he probably has not many years to live beyond the 65, and it will be a recognition during but a few months at best. Therefore, it seems to me, that $18 a month will be more in keeping with the dignity of the country and more in keeping with a proper recognition of his services, and yet I share the feeling which is expressed that no monetary consideration can measure heroism and bravery. No man living would think to risk and to do that which this bill requires him to do because he thought in his old age he would get a pension of $10 a month. That is not his part. The payment of the pension is our part. Our part is the $10 or $18 a month, and let us measure it up somewhere in keeping with the dignity of our Nation and our country. As the chairman of the committee has already stated, the amount we give in such pensions is less than given by any other nation of the world, so while we are not exalting the deeds of the battle field above the deeds of the lives of our citizens, let us make it commensurate with our dignity by increasing this amount from $10 to $18. [Applause.]

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the committee opposes this proposed amendment for the very good reason that the committee that represented these men who expected to be placed upon this holl of honor, if this act should pass, did not ask it. They stated to our committee that they did not want to add a large pension to the present pensions they now draw, because it would look too much like it was a matter of pay and pensions instead of a matter of honor. They only asked that $10 be allowed as pension under this bill, and we placed it at this amount in obedience to the request that was made by these soldiers when they came before our committee.

I can agree with all that my friend from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] says of his admiration of these gallant soldiers. We want to do them justice. We recognize the great service that they have rendered in preserving this Union during the Civil War and their great service in other wars, but I am not in favor of giving them large pensions now in addition to the liberal pensions they are already drawing. I am opposed to this amendment, and I hope the committee will vote it down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MOON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4701) to establish in the War Department and in the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the Army and Navy medal of honor honor roll, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the bill will, as their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay," those present and not voting will answer "present," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 211, nays 108, answered "present" 1, not voting 114, as follows:

PENSIONS, WAR WITH SPAIN, ETC.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 54.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 54) to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in China.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] in the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 54, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 54, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act any officer or enlisted man who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States, either as a regular or volunteer, during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection or in China, between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive, service to be computed from date of enlistment to date of discharge, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, has died or shall hereafter die leaving a widow without means of support other than her daily labor, and an actual net income not exceeding $250 per year, or leaving a minor child or children under the age of 16 years, such widow shall upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his Army or Navy service, be placed on the pension roll from the date of the filing of her application therefor under this act, at the rate of $12 per month during her widowhood, and shall also be paid $2 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under 16 years of age, and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow, leaving a child or children of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16: Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of said child, or during the period of such disability, and shall commence from the date of application therefor after the passage of this act: Provided further, That said widow shall have married said officer or enlisted man previous to the passage of this act: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private.

SEC. 2. That no agent, attorney, or other person engaged in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any claim under the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain for such services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting such claim a sum greater than $10, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension or claim allowed or due such pensioner or claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this bill in its present form is designed to pension the widows and minor children of all volunteer soldiers and sailors who served 90 days or more during the War with Spain and received an honorable discharge therefrom, all furloughs to be computed as service, and to certain soldiers of the Regular Establishment.

The committee intended and, after an exhaustive discussion of the matter, believe that this bill in its present shape provides for the following beneficiaries:

First. The sum of $12 per month to every widow of a volunteer soldier or sailor who served 90 days or more during the War with Spain, including the period of all furloughs in such service (the Philippine insurrection and Boxer uprising in China are included), provided she married the soldier prior to the passage of this act and has a net annual income not in excess of $250 a year. Such widow would also receive $2 per month additional for each minor child under 16 years of age.

Second. In event such a volunteer soldier or sailor dies leaving no widow, but leaving minor children under 16 years of age, the bill would allow $12 per month to such minor children, to be equally divided between them, plus $2 per month additional for each minor child as long as they were under 16 years of age.

Third. The amendment to the bill would make the same provision for widows and minor children of soldiers or sailors who served in the Regular Establishment between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, who rendered 90 days or more actual military or naval service in connection with the above-mentioned hostilities. Your committee does not believe that the provisions of this bill should extend to the widows or minors of soldiers or sailors of the Regular Establishment whose service was rendered entirely within the confines of the United States and was in no manner connected with any of the above-mentioned hostilities, and the amendment was drawn for the purpose of excluding all such.

The pension is limited to such widow who is without means of support other than her daily labor and who has not an actual net income exceeding $250 a year. This monthly allowance is the same as that allowed by statute to the widows and orphans of veterans of other wars and Indian campaigns, only that the existing statute does not exempt any on account of the income she might possess. This greatly lessens the number who would be benefited by the proposed law.

The number of widows and orphans who would come within the provisions of this bill can not be definitely estimated.

The United Spanish War Veterans made an investigation and reported that there are about 4,000 widows of men who served in the Spanish and Philippine Wars; but how many of them would be excluded from a pension under this bill on account of not being dependent on their own labor or for having an income of more than $250 a year could only be conjectured. Destitute widows and orphans of these veterans are now assisted by the United Spanish War Veterans; but surely no one will claim that those who went forth to fight should now carry the burden of those dependent ones while the great mass of our people who stayed at home should be exempt from contributing their just share.

Under the existing law it is necessary for a widow to prove that her husband died from disabilities incurred in the service, and this in many cases is an impossible task. You will recall that for the first time in the history of our country large numbers of men served in the Tropics under the most unfavorable conditions. The summer of 1898 was one of the hottest ever known. Most of our men were called suddenly from the peaceful walks of life and were sent into the swamps and jungles of Cuba, where the drinking water was unfit for a human being and the food supply was of a very questionable quality. Their constitutions were quickly undermined, and the vast majority were never again as strong and robust as they had been before. Conditions in the Philippine campaign were nearly as bad. These men, returning again to the civil walks of life, were not as well able to care for themselves or families as though they had not been soldiers. Finally, who can say how much their Army experiences shortened their days? No one. Under these circumstances it is impossible for the widow to prove her right to a pension, and it is to do away with the necessity of proof under these circumstances that this bill was drawn.

There were about 434,000 men who served in these wars, of whom about one-fourth were in the regular service. Between 75,000 and 100,000 were assigned to the Philippine Islands. There were 826 battles and skirmishes, and the total mortality was about 12,000 lives. Of course, a far greater number died of sickness in those fever-laden tropical countries than were killed in battle.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like to inquire if the number given there, 12,000, is the total number of killed in battle and died of wounds and from sickness? That included all those classes?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes. It included those who died from sickness or other causes incident to service.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is an interesting fact.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. These men were not drafted into the service, but went at their country's call without even a bounty. Now for us to refuse to care for their dependents, as well as we care for the dependents of the veterans of other wars, would be discriminating against our brave and worthy men.

When the National Government made provision for pensioning the soldiers of the Civil War, the public debt was, in round numbers, $2,300,000,000, or $60 per capita. To-day it is $1,027,000,000, or $10 per capita. Then the national wealth was thirty billions while now it is nearly two hundred billions, so that the burden to be borne is exceedingly small.

Your committee has tried hard to obtain an accurate estimate of the cost if this bill should become a law. This has been a difficult matter, as there are uncertain elements entering into it. In 1912 the then Commissioner of Pensions furnished data to the Secretary of the Interior, who gave an estimate of the cost of a bill quite similar to this one as being $2,500,000 annually. The same estimate was given by the present Secretary of the Interior on information furnished by the Commissioner of Pensions. That is, the cost would be $2,500,000 for the first year and small increases for a number of years. The statement was made in both cases that it was impossible, from the data in the Pension Office, to give an accurate estimate. The reason is that the subject of dependence has never entered into any of the claims of widows and orphans of these veterans, and so they have no accurate data to guide them.

Your committee could not agree with this estimate, and for a time was at a loss to know how the estimate was made. On inquiry it was learned that the officer who made it used as his basis what he termed "a law of average." He secured a table of the average number of marriages among men of a given age, and then applied it to the maximum number of men who served between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902. Following out this rule showed that there would be 15,000 claims the first year at a cost of $2,500,000 and a gradual increase for some years afterwards.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. DYER. This bill, then, would lessen the probable cost?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes; materially.

Mr. DYER. Below the bill in the Sixty-third Congress?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. DYER. I will ask the gentleman if the bill which was favorably reported in the Sixty-third Congress passed the House?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes; it passed the House by a vote of about 3 to 1.

Mr. DYER. And also in the Sixty-second Congress?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes; and by a vote of substantially 3 to 1 in the Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In the matter of Civil War pensions there is a law providing that widows shall not have pensions who married the veterans after the year 1890?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes; after June 27, 1890.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is the provision in this law respecting marriages?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I will come to that. I have it all set out in this statement.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has any date been fixed, or does it take effect from the passage of the act?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Under this bill, widows will have the same pensionable status as the widows of all soldiers and sailors of other wars, with the exception of the dependency clause in this bill of $250 per annum and marriage prior to date of passage of act.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Up to the passage of the act?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So that the sooner the bill is passed the more the Government will save on marriages?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. SWITZER. I understand this bill will not cost as much annual appropriation as the bill that passed in the Sixty-second Congress and in the Sixty-third Congress?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. SWITZER. I understand so.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. If the gentleman will wait a moment, I will make it clear to Members of the House why this bill will not cost as much as the bill that was passed in the Sixty-second Congress.

We could see no warrant for this peculiar method of arriving at this conclusion. We believed that a fairer plan would be to have an estimate upon the number of claims filed. In the Bureau of Pensions there are about 5,000 rejected claims of widows and orphans affected by this law. The Spanish War veterans give some aid to these people and have a list of about 4,000 of them. If we base our estimate on 5,000, the cost for the first year would be $720,000, but, in order to be absolutely safe, we will say there are twice that number, or 10,000. This would bring the cost up to $1,440,000. This is the reason that we have placed the maximum cost for the first year at about $1,500,000.

The official report of the Commissioner of Pensions for the fiscal year 1913 shows that there were 59,852 persons removed from the pension rolls, and 19,758 were added during that year, leaving a net loss of 40,094. There was an unexpended balance during that year of $5,348,215.65. Reports of the Commissioner of Pensions for the fiscal years 1914 and 1915 show that there was about the same decrease each of those years. Those on the pension rolls are decreasing, from death, remarriage, minors attaining the age of 16 years, failure to claim pensions, and other causes, nearly 60,000 a year, or 5,000 a month. The amount remaining unexpended from the appropriation runs about $5,000,000 a year.

We take the position that if this bill would cost twice as much as the estimate of the Interior Department, which I think I have shown to be much too high, still this rich and prosperous country should not refuse to help the widows and orphans of those who risked their lives in defense of their country. If we have to scrimp in anything, let it not be with the helpless and dependent ones of those who faced bullets and tropical fevers when called upon by their country to do so.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to call your attention to an important change in this bill from the one introduced in the Sixty-third Congress. That bill did not make an exception for the men in the Regular Establishment who did not take part in our foreign wars between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902. The Committee on Pensions in the Sixty-third Congress had this matter up for consideration and made an effort to obtain some exact data that would be a guide in shaping this provision of the bill. No information could be obtained from the War Department, however, and the committee was informed that no such data could be secured.

From all the information the committee could secure from various sources at that time, it came to the conclusion that there was not a very large number of the Regular Establishment affected, and therefore they were all included in the provision of the bill.

When this bill was under consideration the committee again attempted to obtain this information, and was officially advised by the Adjutant General of the War Department that there were 24,400 in the Army alone who would be affected. As this bill is intended to relieve only the widows and minor children of those serving in the Regular Establishment who actually took part for at least 90 days in the military service in Cuba, the Philippine Islands, or China, we have excluded from its provisions all sailors, soldiers, and marines of the Regular Establishment who were not actually so engaged.

We have placed the attorney fee at $10, which is the same as that allowed under the act of June 27, 1890. In many cases there will be considerable correspondence in the case, so if we made the fee less than this amount the better class of attorneys would not handle the cases. In a large share of the cases no attorney will be needed, so no fee will be required.

Nearly 18 years have rolled by since war was declared on Spain, and the young men who flocked to the colors are now passing middle life. They have a splendid organization, known as the United Spanish War Veterans. It numbers among its members a large share of those still living who upheld our standard in that war. They have never made a single request for legislation in their own behalf, but they stand solidly behind this measure. It is not for themselves, but for the dependent ones of those who are sleeping their last long sleep. I think we should heed this one request and grant this pension.

About a dozen Members have introduced bills for about the same purpose. This committee has given careful consideration to all of them, and we believe we have adopted the best ideas they contain. We hope this bill will cover the field so thoroughly that it will not be necessary to pass private pension bills to relieve the distress of widows in any case.

In our country we have adopted the policy that we actually owe something to those who have defended their country and also to those women who gave up their husbands for service at the front and who often suffered privations and many hardships as a result. It is no longer considered a gift or a donation from the Government, but simply payment for services rendered. The vast majority of the men who went as volunteers to the Spanish War were young and just commencing to build homes and rear their families. Most of them had no accumulations whatever, so you can imagine what each family would have to live on from what a soldier could save from his very meager salary. In most cases it was not over one-fourth what he could have earned if he were at his regular vocation. He gave up his salary and the comforts of home when President McKinley called for volunteers to uphold the Nation's honor. He went into tropical lands, under a blazing summer sun, endured the pests of flies, mosquitoes, and deadly vipers, drank swamp water, and ate food so bad the dogs would not eat it at home, and all for a compensation of $16 a month. In times of peace those men could not have been hired to endure the miseries of that service, aside from the danger of the battle, for $100 a month. Then who can say the Government does not owe their families something? During the absence of their husbands many of these poor women went out to work as servants to support their little ones, and, no doubt, a large number of them are working to-day trying to take the place of both father and mother that those children might be educated and started aright on the great highway of life. Let us lighten that burden for them a little. Out of the superabundance of this great country, with its accumulated wealth of nearly $200,000,000,000, let us give a little to those widows and orphans. The amount for each is very little. Only $2 a month for each child and $12 a month for each widow, and this only on condition that she does not have an income of $250 a year, or about $21 a month. Even that amount is small for anyone to live on during these times of high cost of living, without supporting any children, so imagine what it must mean for the widow and several helpless children. This is not a charity; it is simply plain justice to the needy dependents of our brave soldiers.

I want to call the attention of the committee to a typographical error in the bill. At the proper time I shall offer an amendment to correct it. By referring to the bill on the first page, and to the report accompanying the bill, you will see that where "1908" appears it should be "1898." It is my purpose to correct this by an amendment at the proper time. Manifestly it was a typographical error.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio, my colleague [Mr. SWITZER], asked me a while ago why we thought this bill would not require as much of an appropriation as the bill passed in the Sixty-third Congress. My opinion is based on these grounds: When we passed the bill in the Sixty-third Congress, as I stated a while ago, we made an effort to learn the number of members of the Regular Establishment who had served abroad. I ought to go back and preface my remarks by the statement that on February 2, 1901, it was decided to increase the Regular Establishment up to 100,000. At that time we had a standing army numbering about 50,000, so that there were about 50,000 men added to the Regular Establishment at that time.

In the Sixty-third Congress we endeavored to secure from the Interior Department, through the Bureau of Pensions, some estimate as to the number of men in the Regular Establishment who actually took part in these wars; that is, those members of the Regular Establishment who left the confines of the United States and who participated in these hostilities either in Cuba, the Philippines, or the Boxer uprising. We were not able to get that information, but we were assured that there were just a very small number, just a mere handful, and we decided to cover those in and let them go in with the volunteers. This year we asked for the same information, and if the gentleman will refer to the report he will see in the letter of The Adjutant General that he states that there are about 24,400 members of the Regular Army who did not leave the confines of the United States. These men were doing post duty, and it is not the intention of the committee to have the members of the Regular Establishment who were doing post duty, and who did not actually participate in these wars, come under the provisions of this bill. So therefore if we have 24,400 less, of course it will not take as much money to carry out the provisions of this bill as it would have taken to carry out the provisions of the bill passed in the Sixty-third Congress.

Mr. SWITZER. As I understand it, only the widows of soldiers who saw some foreign service or who were being trained for the purpose of taking part in the foreign service will receive pensions. Is that correct?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. This bill provides that every volunteer soldier who was honorably discharged—all furloughs to be included—that the widows of such soldiers shall receive pensions of $12 a month, but it includes only those members of the Regular Establishment who left the confines of the United States and actually participated in those hostilities.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the gentleman whether or not any service was performed in those wars by any other soldiers except those who volunteered?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes; when the War with Spain broke out there were a number of members of the Regular Establishment who were covered in. These members of the Regular Establishment were rushed to Cuba at that time, and they, of course, participated in that war just as much, if not more, than some of the volunteers; and the committee felt that it would not be right to discriminate against those members of the Regular Establishment who went to Cuba and the Philippines and actually participated in those hostilities, and we thought they should be included; but the committee did not feel that the members of the Regular Establishment who were taken in after the War with Spain had practically closed and who were merely doing post duty within the United States should be included.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is meant by "soldiers of the Regular Establishment"?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The Regular Army and Navy of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it necessary that a soldier should have been engaged in battle in order to come within the terms of this bill?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. No; but rendered service in connection with hostilities.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I will.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I have endeavored to follow my colleague very closely in his statement concerning this bill, but I failed to catch it, if he made the statement how many soldiers there were who were engaged in the Philippines or in the war in Cuba or the Boxer uprising. I would like to know just how many soldiers' widows might be beneficiaries, if every soldier married and left a widow—in other words, how many soldiers were engaged in these three services?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. All told, in the regular establishment and the volunteers there were about 434,000.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Four hundred and thirty-four thousand?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes; including those in the Regular Army and those in the Volunteer Service during our war with Spain, those who participated in the Boxer uprising and in the war in the Philippines, and those who went to Cuba.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Then, do I understand that if all those 434,000 soldiers married and then died and left widows, it would be possible for that many widows at some time to become beneficiaries under this law?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. No; that would not be the case.

Mr. ASHBROOK. What would be the case? I should like to know what are the possibilities under this bill, as to the number of beneficiaries?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. If the gentleman will bear with me a moment, I think I can answer that. I will say to my colleague that that is set out in the report, which gives all of the information from every source the committee could obtain.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I do not think the gentleman understands my question. There are not 430,000 soldiers who saw service on foreign soil whose widows might be beneficiaries, are there?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I did not say that all saw service on foreign soil.

Mr. ASHBROOK. How many soldiers saw service during the period mentioned in this bill on foreign soil?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I can not tell the gentleman how many living within the confines of the United States saw service on foreign soil. It would be a difficult matter to get this information.

Mr. SMITH of New York. How many pensionable widows can there possibly be under this provision?

Mr. ASHBROOK. That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. KEARNS. If the gentleman will allow me, there were 443,000 men who would have a pensionable status under the bill. If everyone left a widow, there would be 443,000 of them.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Less 24,400 that we have excluded, which was in the bill in the Sixty-third Congress.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I may be very obtuse on this subject, but surely there were not 443,000 soldiers who saw service on foreign soil.

Mr. KEARNS. No; 443,000 soldiers whose widows might be entitled to a pension if this becomes a law. The widow of every man who was a volunteer would get a pension, but if she was the widow of a Regular Army soldier she would not get a pension unless the Regular Army soldier had seen service in the Philippines, Cuba, or in China.

Mr. ASHBROOK. What I would like to know is how many beneficiaries there can possibly be under this bill?

Mr. KEARNS. No one can tell, for you do not know how many are married.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Assume that they were all married.

Mr. KEARNS. Then it would be the difference between 443,000 and 24,200.

Mr. DYER. There is a provision that they must not have a net income of over $250.

Mr. ASHBROOK. That would not exclude many.

Mr. DYER. It would exclude mine.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. On page 3 of the report it says:

> Of the 443,000 who served in these warfares, about one-fourth were in the regular service, and from 75,000 to 100,000 were assigned to duty in the Philippine Islands.

In these warfares there were 826 battles and skirmishes, in 515 of which men were killed or wounded. The whole mortality of the campaigns was 12,000 lives.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The larger part of the soldiers who lost their lives lost them on account of climatic conditions which were unusual at that time.

Mr. LOBECK. That ought to give you some idea of how many pensions would come by reason of this bill. A good many men have died since and left no widows.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. And a good many would not marry.

Mr. SMITH of New York. And a good many wives may have died first.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. In my part of the country there are many fine young men who rushed into the Regular Army at the very first of the War with Spain, with the idea that they could get to the front quicker that way than by going into the volunteer organization. I understand that some of those organizations were not ordered outside of continental America. Are they covered by this bill?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The bill covers every volunteer soldier, but only the regular soldier who rendered some actual service in connection with that war.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman did not understand my question. I will make it specific. There was a young man from Port Jervis, in Mr. PLATT'S district, who enlisted in the Fifth Regular Artillery organization, that had been in the Regular Army for a hundred years, his idea being that in that way he would get into actual service quicker than by going with the Volunteers. I do not think his battery was ordered out of the United States. What I want to know is whether this bill would, if he died, give his widow a pension.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. It was an exceedingly difficult matter to frame this bill so as to cover in all of the Regular Army soldiers. When the war was declared there was a small number of the Regular Establishment that did not leave continental America, and it is barely possible that a few of those soldiers might not benefit by this bill. But the great majority of the Regular Establishment, when war was declared, were sent off to Cuba, and a very small percentage of the members of the Regular Army covered in who did not leave continental America. Many of these, however, were engaged in actual military duty in connection with this war.

Mr. BENNET. If, as a matter of fact, this Artillery was not ordered out of the country, the widow of this young man I have mentioned would not come in under this bill.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I do not think she would, the way the bill is drawn.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Suppose a man was in the Coast Artillery in the Spanish War, does the gentleman mean to say that his widow would not have the benefit of the bill?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The way the bill is drawn, if the member of the Regular Army left the confines of the United States and participated in——

Mr. GARDNER. I am not talking about that. Suppose he stayed in the coast defense where if any ships came across he would be under fire. Is not his widow just as much entitled to the benefit of the bill as if he went down to Camp Thomas?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The amendment to this bill is intended to cover the widows and minor children of every soldier and sailor of the Regular Establishment whose record shows that he rendered actual military or naval service in connection with this war. In my opinion the provisions of this bill cover the case which you have just mentioned and would give a pension to such a man's widow.

The committee felt that those men were not to be considered in the same class as the others who had gone into Cuba and actually participated in those hostilities unless they show actual military or naval service in connection with this war.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. When did the House first pass a bill on this subject—in 1912?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. It was in the Sixty-second Congress. It was substantially the same bill as was passed last year.

Mr. LENROOT. In the Sixty-second Congress that bill confined the benefits to widows who had married soldiers prior to the passage of that act, which the gentleman says was in 1912?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. This will bring it down to the passage of this act. I want to ask the gentleman, if the committee was of opinion that only widows would be entitled to the benefits of the act who married prior to 1912, what condition has arisen since that time to change that so that it should be extended?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. This bill was patterned after the act of June 27, 1890, and that bill when it passed pensioned all widows up until the passage of the act, June 27, 1890. The beneficiaries of this bill have the same pensionable status as the widows of every other war, with the exception that there is a dependency clause in this bill of $250 a year.

Mr. LENROOT. If that is a good reason, it would be to the benefit of the widows of the Spanish soldiers to postpone the operation of this bill for two years more, if it is to be extended every two years.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. If the bill should become a law, of course, that bar would remain there.

Mr. LENROOT. And if two years from now we apply the same rule, we would let in that many more widows.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes; the longer you defer the passage of the bill, that would be true.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, the fact is, the committee has not undertaken to fix any time that would be just on the merits to cut off widows from the benefits of this bill?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. No, they have not, except those who marry after the passage of the act.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman not think the committee ought to?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that however just or unjust it may be, the theory of the act of 1890 and the theory of this bill is that it will not offer a premium to women to marry these old soldiers, thinking that in case of widowhood they would be entitled to a pension, a thing that they can not know before the bill becomes a law. I do not say whether it is just or unjust, but that was the theory of the act of 1890 and undoubtedly the theory of this.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. You state the case exactly.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. I would like to know whether the provisions of the gentleman's bill cover widows of soldiers who married after their service in the Army was over?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. I read from the top of page 2 of the bill:

> Or any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Establishment who rendered 90 days or more actual military or naval service in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection or in China between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive.

Is the gentleman from Ohio of the opinion that the words "actual military or naval service" mean that a man must have gone out of the country and have actually participated in a battle?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. That is the construction that the committee felt would be placed upon it when they had the bill worded as it is.

Mr. BENNET. I am very frank to say that I think the committee is wrong, and that any officer or enlisted man in the Regular Establishment who answered one single bugle call is covered by that, and I am glad they are.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on Pensions was informed that the Pension Bureau would construe that language to mean that the soldier must have served outside of the United States; that that was the construction which would be put upon it under their decisions.

Mr. BENNET. If the Pension Bureau puts that construction upon it, I will leave it to any lawyer on this floor whether the Pension Bureau in some way will not be reversed, because actual military service means that when a man has taken the oath and comes under authority he is doing actual military service.

Mr. KEATING. Who would reverse the Pension Bureau?

Mr. BENNET. The Secretary of the Interior might. He has the power.

Mr. KEATING. The Secretary of the Interior is the head of the Pension Bureau, as a matter of fact.

Mr. BENNET. He is over the Pension Bureau.

Mr. KEATING. He is bound by the decisions of the Pension Bureau. The Pension Bureau has interpreted similar language in other bills.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I would call the gentleman's attention to line 3 on page 1 of the bill. Please understand the way the bill is worded:

> That from and after the passage of this act if any volunteer officer or enlisted man who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the War with Spain—

Now, just note the reading of the bill on page 2, where it says that members of the Regular Establishment are to be affected "who rendered 90 days or more actual military or naval service in the Army or Navy of the United States," and so forth. Now, before this bill was drawn I had the examiner of the committee to discuss with the construing officials of the Bureau of Pensions this amendment, and it was their opinion it would require some actual military or naval service of the Regular Establishment to give title.

Mr. BENNET. All I can say is that while I was out of this House on a temporary recess, owing to reasons over which I had absolutely no control, I participated in several courts-martial and had occasion to look up the statutes in reference to actual military service, and while it is absolutely bootless for the gentleman and myself to argue back and forth I want to say to the gentleman it is my hope, based on my experience, which I think justifies the hope, that the young man whose case I instanced will be covered by this language.

Mr. MANN. "Actual military service" would, of course, cover any service and would cover any service in the War with Spain. It does not say "during the War with Spain," but it says "military service in the War with Spain." Now, say a man was out here on the plains in the Army, was he in the War with Spain until——

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The gentleman from Illinois expresses it better than I could myself.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, take the case which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] stated of a man who was in the Regular Establishment and was put in the Coast Artillery at Fort Wadsworth—I do not know he used the name, but I will use the name—he was put there to man the coast defenses during the War with Spain, in the War with Spain, prepared to man that battery against the fleet which at one time was thought to be coming to this country to attack our coast ports. What is the other instance the gentleman cited?

Mr. MANN. I gave an instance of a man on the plains, and if the War Department holds that man was serving in the War with Spain, his widow is entitled to a pension under this bill.

Mr. BENNET. That is what I say.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman says unless he went out of the country.

Mr. MANN. He would have to go out of the country in a War with Spain.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4308. An act to purchase a site and erect thereon a suitable building for post office and other governmental offices at Sandusky, Ohio, and for other purposes.

PENSIONS, WAR WITH SPAIN, ETC.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SELLS and Mr. MILLER of Delaware rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield the floor?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The gentleman from Ohio yielded to the gentleman from Illinois. I desire to ask how much time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I reserve the balance of that time.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, am I recognized for one hour?

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. SELLS. No; I am not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls attention to the new rule under which we operate on Calendar Wednesday, which provides that there shall be only two hours of general debate, to be divided equally between those in favor and those opposed to a measure. Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] is in favor of the measure, and has occupied 50 minutes. If there is any gentleman who is opposed to the bill, the Chair will recognize him for one hour at this time. If not, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SELLS. I understood that if any gentleman was opposed to the bill he was entitled to time. I was simply asking to be recognized because some gentlemen on this side desired to be heard in behalf of the bill. I yield 10 minutes now to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this is the third time that a bill of this character has been before the House, twice having been passed, and this time it will also be passed without question. I was interested to note that no Member of the House at the present time feels disposed to take the hour offered to him in opposition to the bill. I think it speaks well for the sentiment among the membership of the House and in addition reflects the sentiments of the constituencies from which they come. There are two or three things in this bill I think worthy of special commendation, and I desire to address myself to one of the features wherein I do not quite agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I understood the gentleman to say—and if I am incorrect in my understanding he will correct me—that if the language on the top of page 2 read "during the War with Spain" and not "in the War with Spain," as it does, it might make a difference. I do not know just what distinction the gentleman sought to draw by his statement, and I can not see any difference there whatever, and it seems to me that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET]——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. "During the War with Spain" would be a matter of time. We have had this matter discussed several times before, as the gentleman remembers. I only speak from an impression and an indefinite recollection, but my recollection is that there was deliberate intent on the part of the House here before, while this is now proposed as an amendment to say that in the war meant in the military service engaged in some way in the war. Originally the bill did not contain any provision in reference to service in China.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I agree with the gentleman entirely in that respect. The service rendered must be in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps that was engaged in some way, directly or indirectly, in the War with Spain, but he might simply have had military service during that period.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What does the gentleman understand to be the difference, if any, between "actual" military or naval service in the war and the expression without the use of the word "actual."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. No difference, in my judgment. The legal effect is the same whether the word "actual" is there or not. If a man is engaged in the Military or Naval Establishment of the United States, he is actually in it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Suppose he belonged to the Regular Army and was in a hospital.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. During the entire period of time?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. He would be engaging either actually or by construction in the War with Spain.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He would be in the military service?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. He would not be in the military service.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He would be in the hospital. He would be drawing pay, and as a member of the military service he would not be in the actual service in the sense that this bill contemplates.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The word "actual" means something——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not agree with the gentleman, although he may be correct.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota (continuing). If he belongs to the Regular Army, even though he is in the hospital all the time.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. GARRETT. I do not know the language of the law or upon what the construction was based, but I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota and of the committee to a construction that was made of the Civil War pension act. There were a number of regiments made up at Rock Island prison from Confederate soldiers who had been captured and who were prisoners of war. They enlisted in the Union Army, or in the Army of the United States, with the understanding that they should not be sent back South to fight their former comrades in arms, but would go West to operate on the plains and guard the frontier against Indians. And for many years those gentlemen sought to obtain a pension, and for many years they were refused on the ground that they were not actually engaged in the service. But finally—I hope I am not taking up too much of the gentleman's time——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman is taking it up to good advantage. He can take all he wants.

Mr. GARRETT. But finally there was a construction given the law by the Secretary of the Interior—I have forgotten whom now. I think the first construction given favorable to them was by a Pension Commissioner from Kansas—I think his name was Ware—and that was sustained by the then Secretary of the Interior, whose name I have forgotten for the moment, whereby it was held that inasmuch—at least this was the logic of their holding—inasmuch as they went out there and released soldiers in the Regular Army who could go down and engage in what was technically called in the act "the War of the Rebellion," they had a pensionable status; and they are drawing pensions to-day under that construction.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I thank the gentleman for his statement, which is very pertinent to this subject.

Mr. LINTHICUM. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. I would like to know how we are proceeding. If there is no one opposed to this bill, how is the extra hour allowed? I understood by the rule which we adopted the other day that if there was no opposition to the bill it was but one hour.

Mr. MANN. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that a parliamentary inquiry is not in order when anyone has the floor.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am sure if the gentleman from Maryland had been in when the question was put by the Chair he would be aware of the parliamentary situation.

Mr. KEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I can not understand why——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] has the floor.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Referring again to the question propounded by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], I think the distinction, if there is any to be made, is that this man, who was in the hospital, would not be engaged in a war with Spain any more than he would have engaged in the War with Spain if he had been in Sitka, Alaska, or temporarily in Siberia. He would not have been engaged in that war. If he were in a military organization that was engaged in the War with Spain, then he would be in that war, whether the word "actual" were used or otherwise.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will say to the gentleman that if he will look at line 7 he will find this language, following that which we have been discussing:

And who has been honorably discharged therefrom.

It does not make any difference whether you say you honorably discharged the man from actual service or honorably discharged a man from the military service. The word "actual," as demonstrated by that language, is superfluous.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I agree with the gentleman. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CARY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. CARY. I would like to ask the gentleman if a man in a regiment or company which was ordered to Cuba or the Philippines was taken sick and placed in a hospital, and could not follow his company, is entitled to a pension under this act?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly. There is no question about that.

Mr. GARDNER. I did not get the gentleman's answer.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly. He would be entitled to a pension.

Mr. GARDNER. May I put a question to the gentleman? In his State during the Spanish War, if I mistake not, there was an Indian uprising, in which there were a number of regular soldiers killed. Unless I am mistaken, they belonged to some Infantry companies in a regiment that did see service. Are the widows of the soldiers who were engaged in putting down those Indian uprisings pensionable under this bill?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not think any such condition as that existed during the period of time specified in the bill.

Mr. GARDNER. I think so.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I should say that was not a part of the War with Spain.

Mr. GARDNER. Say that Companies A, B, and C, were sent to Camp Thomas as part of the headquarters detachment, the widows of the men serving in those companies would be pensionable; but the widows of men in Companies D, E, and F, who were fighting the Indians in Minnesota during that time, would not be pensionable?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is true. Mr. Chairman, again let me say——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. LINTHICUM rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Maryland rise?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I rise to make a point of order that the debate is not in order, because the gentleman from Minnesota is not opposed to the bill; that under the rule we adopted the other day, if there is no one opposed to the bill, there is but one hour given for debate, and unless the gentleman is opposed to the bill he is not entitled to the floor.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the word "actually" in the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. That rule will be found in the last paragraph of Rule XXIV as amended, that not more than two hours of general debate shall be permitted on any measure called up on Wednesday, and all debate shall be confined to the subject matter of the bill. The time is to be equally divided between those for and against the bill. Now, if the gentleman is not opposed to the bill, I make the point of order that he is not entitled to the floor.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], while he has read the rule loudly enough has not read it carefully. The rule provides that there shall not be more than two hours' general debate. This is the limitation. It provides that debate is to be divided between those in favor of the bill and those against the bill. The Chair correctly stated the case. The limitation is for two hours' debate. There is no rule that says the debate shall be one hour, but that it shall not exceed two hours.

Mr. LINTHICUM. How can the two hours be equally divided between those for and against the bill if there is nobody against the bill?

Mr. MANN. It can not be, and hence that shows that it can not be done. [Laughter.] If there is nobody opposed to the bill, it is impossible to divide an hour equally between those for and those against.

But that is not the gentleman's point of order. The point of order was to the effect that the general debate ceased in an hour if no one was opposed to the bill. That is not the rule. The rule is that the general debate shall not exceed two hours. If anyone desired to take the floor in opposition to the bill, he had the opportunity. So the point of order does not lie.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, the reading of the rule is that not more than two hours shall be consumed. That is the limitation. If the rule had said that they must have two hours, the gentleman from Illinois would be correct, but it is limited to two hours. In what way? If there are those who are in favor of the bill and those opposed to it, the time must be divided equally. The rule is mandatory that it shall be divided equally. The House must sit for an hour if no one is opposed to it, if he be correct. The House must sit for an hour in the absence of an express declaration that you must debate two hours. In the event there is no one against the bill, the time is up when the hour is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT). The Chair is prepared to rule. This rule crystallizes into parliamentary law what has been a long-continued practice of the House; that is, that debate shall be——

Mr. SLAYDEN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to correct one declaration that was made, at least, that there is nobody opposed to the bill. I am opposed to the bill. [Laughter.] I am opposed to any more pension bills now. We have been prodigal already in that respect, and while I recognize the utter hopelessness of defeating a bill for pensions with an organized vote for it, I want to protest that there is somebody in the House who is opposed to the existing pension system.

Mr. MANN. Nobody said that nobody opposed to the bill had come into the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair called attention to the rule under which we are operating, and announced his readiness to recognize anyone opposed to the bill. No one then arose asking for recognition for purposes of debate, and therefore the Chair recognized the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SELLS]. The Chair thinks that the point of order made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] is not well taken.

Without going into refinements about it, it would arbitrarily limit the debate otherwise than as fixed by the rule itself. If a case should arise where no one was opposed to the bill and no one demanded recognition, then there could in fact be only one hour of debate. The Chair does not think that was the purpose or the spirit or the intention of the rule, and the Chair therefore overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I am recognized for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know how much time the gentleman has consumed. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SELLS] yielded to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. SELLS. I then yielded to him five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, as the membership of the House well knows, under the law as at present the veteran of the Spanish-American War or of the insurrection in the Philippines, in order that he may secure a pension for disabilities incurred in that service must be able to prove, and prove in a very satisfactory way, too, first, that the disability exists, and secondly, that it did result from his military service.

This bill goes a little step further when it treats with the widow of the veteran. It says that should the soldier die, then his widow shall not be compelled to establish that the disability from which he died was incurred in the military service.

Is there reason for this? I say yes, and I say it with all the feeling that I can command. When we engaged in the war against Spain and proceeded to put down the insurrection in the Philippines, we wrote a new chapter in American achievement and American experience. We sent our boys, who had lived all their lives in a temperate land, where climate and health conditions were as nearly perfect as they can well be anywhere in the world, into tropical lands, East and West, where health conditions and sanitation are the worst of any place in the world. Not only did we send these boys from this healthful climate to fight for the flag, to fight for the principles we hold dear to humanity, but as we all know, they were largely volunteer organizations, and one of the first things that a volunteer military organization does is to fail to keep its health records very accurately or very well.

Why, cases have been called to my personal attention where the men in the Philippine Islands were marching day in and day out, in the heat of the tropical sun, in the downpour of the tropical torrents, many of them sick, some of them moving on, almost sick unto death, and no record whatever was kept of hospital treatment, because there were no hospitals there. No record was kept by the physicians of the treatment they gave to those men on the march and in the camp; so that I am sure it is within the knowledge of every Member of this House that there are many of these cases wherein it is absolutely impossible to establish the connection between the disability and the military service, although that connection does in fact exist.

If it is impossible for the man when he is living, it is certainly impossible—more impossible, if such a thing could be—for his widow to establish it when he is dead. So I think it is needful that we take this additional step now and for all time, so that the widow of a Spanish-American War veteran, or of a veteran of the Philippine war, shall have the same status before the law as the widow of a veteran of the Civil War.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I was not in the Hall when the bill was first presented this afternoon. The gentleman mentioned the fact that two or three bills of a similar character have previously passed the House. He and I both voted for those bills.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Can the gentleman, in a few words, tell the committee whether there is any essential or important difference between the pending bill and the other two measures?

Mr. DYER. No.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There is no essential difference, as I am informed, except that this bill is a little more restrictive than the bill which passed in the Sixty-third Congress. The Sixty-third Congress included both regular and volunteer soldiers who had participated in these campaigns. This one gives to the widows of all volunteer soldiers the opportunities of the bill, but as to the Regular Establishment restricts it to the widows of those who served outside of the United States. I think that is a correct statement.

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. So, Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I shall give this bill my hearty support. Its purpose is to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served 90 days or more in the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection and who were honorably discharged. Under its provisions the widow during her widowhood will get $12 per month and her minor children $2 per month until they reach the age of 16 years. The widow, however, to use the language of the bill, must be "without means of support other than her daily labor and actual net income not exceeding $250 per year."

Under the present law, the widows of the veterans of other wars get this allowance of $12 per month whether they be rich or poor and whether the death of their husbands was caused by disabilities or injuries incurred in the service or not. It is nothing but right that the widows of soldiers who served in the War with Spain or in the Philippine insurrection be put upon an equal footing with the widows of veterans of other wars, which this bill seeks to do. I favor this bill, because in its passage we say to the young manhood of our country who rush to the defense of the flag in days of its peril that "should you lose your lives in defending the honor, the integrity, and the safety of our common country, fear not that the widows and orphan children that you leave behind you will not be cared for by the Government you defended."

Under the provisions of this bill it will not be necessary for the widow to show that which she is at times unable to show, that the death of her husband was caused by injuries received in line of duty while in the service, but all that she will need to prove is that her husband served his country 90 days or more in the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection. This is as it should be.

Our country is devoted to peace. It is not the desire of our people to engage in wars. War spells death and destruction. It means misery and want and woe. It is not to the liking of our people to engage in it, and I dare say that if the peoples of other lands and countries would but do us right we would never engage in another war. But wars there have been and wars there will be. Sad to say, the history of the world is largely composed of them. The millennium is not yet. The day will come, and possibly at no distant date, when our country will again be called to arms. When that call is made, the best blood and brains of the land will rush to the defense of the colors as in days gone by, and I for one want them to know that they will be fighting for a grateful country, for a country that will not force their loved ones to seek the poorhouses of the country after their defenders are no more.

Mr. SELLS. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MCARTHUR].

Mr. MCARTHUR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this bill is designed to pension the widows and minor children of volunteer soldiers and sailors and of certain soldiers and sailors of the regular establishment who served in the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the Boxer uprising. It provides that such widows must have been married to the soldiers or sailors prior to the passage of this act and it establishes automatically a pension of $12 per month, upon satisfactory proof of the death of the soldier or sailor, provided the widow has a net annual income of less than $250 a year. It also provides that widows may draw $2 per month additional for each minor child of the deceased under the age of 16 years.

If such widows remarry, their pensions will automatically cease or will be divided among the children of the deceased until they attain the age of 16 years. There are numerous other provisions as to details, but they have been pretty thoroughly explained by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY], the author of this bill and the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, of which I have the honor of being a member.

RESEMBLES EXISTING LAWS.

In a general way this bill resembles the existing laws relative to pensions for widows of men who fought in other wars, although these other laws do not contain the restrictive clause prohibiting the payment of a pension to a widow whose income is more than $250 per year. This restrictive clause, however, will confine the operation of the proposed measure to cases where widows and orphans are practically destitute, but will deny benefits to those who are in reasonably good circumstances. In this respect the pending measure is an improvement over the existing laws, as it can not be charged that pensions will be paid to widows who are not really in need of financial assistance. There have been many criticisms of our pension system, but these criticisms have been directed at the abuses of the system rather than at the great mass of just and meritorious cases. There have been some fraudulent claims in the past, but these have been the exception rather than the rule, and I do not believe that there exists in this country any person so narrow or penurious who would withhold pensions in meritorious cases.

MEN ASK NOTHING FOR THEMSELVES.

Although nearly 18 years have elapsed since the outbreak of the War with Spain, this is the first general legislation that has ever been urged by the United Spanish-American War Veterans. These men, you will observe, are asking nothing for themselves, but only for provision and protection for their widows and orphans. For a number of years many of these widows and orphans have been cared for by the United Spanish-American War Veterans and its subordinate branches, but is it fair to ask those who risked their lives for our country to make this financial sacrifice when the burden should be borne by the great body of the people who are enjoying the blessings of life, liberty, and property under our flag and by virtue of our Constitution? All fair-minded people will agree that there is but one answer to the question.

VICTIMS OF TROPICAL DISEASES.

I was very much interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER]. I well remember the outbreak of the Spanish-American War and the splendid fashion in which the young men from my State volunteered and went to the front.

The regiments from Oregon and other Western and Northwestern States were ordered to the Philippine Islands, and were there for more than a year. These young men were taken from a mild, temperate climate into the intense heat of the Tropics, and required to undergo strenuous compaigns in a country which was reeking with malaria and other tropical diseases disastrous to the health of people who are accustomed to the climatic conditions of the Temperate Zone. Many of them fell on the field of battle, others died of disease, and many more were so shattered in health that they died within a few years or became permanently disabled. They represented the very best type of our young manhood and the patriotic citizenship of our Republic, and to refuse to pass this bill in the interest of their widows and orphans would be a wanton disregard of our public trust and our country's obligations. The small amount of these proposed pensions will not seriously embarrass the Public Treasury, but even if it should prove a burden, it will be borne ungrudgingly, for the American people will not deny or evade the payment of their just debts and obligations.

MUST DEFINE OUR PENSION POLICY.

The passage of this bill will add another chapter to our general pension policy and will further establish and define the attitude of the Government toward our soldiers and sailors and their widows and orphans. We must make this policy clear and well defined, not only for those who have already defended our country, but for others who may fight for us in the future. In this connection, however, I hope and pray that we will never again be engaged in a war of any character, although we should prepare ourselves for any emergency which may arise and be ready to defend our country from invasion. [Applause.]

WE MUST "CARE FOR HIS WIDOW AND HIS ORPHANS."

Our country has never maintained a large standing army. I do not say this with any reference to the program of preparedness, which I intend to support, but only as a matter of history. In time of war we have summoned large numbers of men to the colors. They have left their homes, their loved ones, their vocations, their all; in many instances, never to return; and in others, to be crippled and maimed for life. It is the history of all wars in this and every other country, that the brunt of work falls upon the men in the ordinary walks of life—on the great body of the common people who are the bone and sinew of the Nation. The average man who enlists is not independent financially, and in a position to leave his loved ones a competence. He should be assured at the time of his enlistment that when he is gone the strong arm of the Government will, in the language of the immortal Lincoln, "care for his widow and for his orphans."

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR DEVELOPED NEW PATRIOTISM.

I honor and revere the brave men, living and dead, who fought through the great Civil War and wrote an epoch-making page in the world's history. They belong to a distinctive class and their deeds of valor and bravery will never be erased from the memory or the affections of the American people. The Spanish-American War drew together and healed all elements of discord that existed in this country by reason of the Civil War, and the courage and patriotism of the sons of the North and the courage and patriotism of the sons of the South, as they fought shoulder to shoulder at San Juan and Malabon, became the common heritage of the American people. The Spanish-American War was a war for humanity and we must not forget the brave boys who fought under our flag in that war and, as a tribute to their valor and patriotism, I trust that the pending bill will pass without a dissenting vote. [Applause.]

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, I agreed to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], who desires to be heard against the bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am very much obliged to the gentleman for his courtesy; but are the rights of those who are opposed to the bill forfeited by the present parliamentary status?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that that is probably true. At the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] the Chair inquired if there was anyone opposed to the bill who desired time. No one rose, and thereupon the Chair recognized the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SELLS] for an hour, and under that particular parliamentary status, the gentleman from Tennessee having recognition and being entitled to the floor, the time has passed from the control of the Chair.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I thought I was filing a claim on behalf of the rights of the opponents of the measure when I addressed the Chair and disagreed to the declaration that there was no opposition to the bill.

Mr. MANN. But that was half an hour too late; that was all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I was asking if I was too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that what he has recited as having occurred at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] was some time before the inquiry by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SELLS] for his courtesy, and I will avail myself of it for a few minutes, probably not for five minutes, as I have expressed myself on this legislation in previous Congresses. I want to call attention to one or two facts that I think ought to be considered, and particularly in view of conditions as they exist at this time.

This body is charged with being persistently, flagrantly, notoriously extravagant, and it takes no man's experience in the marshaling of evidence to prove it. This is a grossly extravagant body, and, as I said a few minutes ago, I now repeat with deliberation that I do not believe it is possible to bring before this Congress any pension bill supported by any important number of the people back home, clothed with the franchise, that it will not pass.

Now, there are one or two lines in this bill to which I want to call attention, wherein I think there should be changes if the bill is to pass, as of course it will pass, being a raid upon the Treasury.

After defining those who shall have pensions it says:

Such widow shall, upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his Army or Navy service, be placed on the pension roll from the date of the filing of her application therefor under this act, at the rate of $12 per month during her widowhood.

Not as a result of injuries received in the war, but upon due proof of the death of her husband. It specifically states that she shall not be called upon to prove that the death was due to any service rendered the country. Under the terms of this bill, if I do not misunderstand it, an ex-soldier of the Spanish War may marry a buxom young woman to-day and get run over by a motor car to-morrow, or fall off a stepladder, or get drowned, and his 18 or 20 year old bride, if she does not marry again, will be pensioned for life.

Now, the widows of the Civil War veterans were not treated with that large liberality. I speak from memory, but my recollection is that in order to cure abuses of old men getting married to young women, putting them on the pension roll and making them a burden to taxpayers for a long life, the law said that they must have married the soldier prior to June 27, 1890. Now you are setting a premium on this thing, and, Mr. Chairman, I shall offer an amendment to this bill—I think two—if I can get recognition, specifically requiring that there shall be proof that the soldier's death is due to disease incurred or wounds or hurts received in the military service. That I shall offer in lines 13 and 14, on page 2, and then, on page 3, line 3, I shall move to strike out the words "passage of this act" and substitute the words "termination of said service," so that it will read "the widow shall have married said officer or enlisted man previous to the termination of said service."

I recognize the uselessness of opposition to this bill. I am only offering a very feeble protest, pitching a straw against the cyclone of extravagance, and trying to save a few dollars out of the hundreds of millions that we are going to be called upon to expend. [Applause.]

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill. A considerable number of people who are beneficiaries of the bill were never outside of the United States proper. I do not speak slightingly of them on that account because really, under the insanitary conditions where volunteers assemble, there is often more disease and death than there is to the soldier in the field of battle.

This bill pensions the widows of the Spanish War soldiers and the war in the Philippines, on the soldier's death, without regard as to whether he died from injuries received in the Army or in the line of duty. I am willing to vote for that, although that was never the case with the widow of the soldier of the Civil War up to 1890. After 1890 the widow was not required, provided she married prior to that time, to prove that the death of the veteran was due to Army service in the line of duty. But that was 26 years ago. There has been much talk in the sensational magazines and in the newspapers about young women, sometimes not of good character, marrying old soldiers in order that they might be pensioned. Gentlemen, I think probably I represent as large a soldier district as any in the United States, and I want to say to you that wives of men who fought for the Union died, and many of the soldiers remarried. Children were born, and yet no pension comes to them unless the death is traced to the line of service between sixty-one and sixty-five. This bill is not subject to amendment in that regard, and I have no desire to try to amend it, because it treats of the War with Spain, and such an amendment would not be germane. I am willing that it should pass, and that it should rest on its own merits, but I want to appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Pensions which reported this bill, or the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and his colleagues, to report a bill for the consideration of the House to care for the widows who married 26 years ago and subsequently. [Applause.] I do not know whether the committee will do it or not, but I hope that it will, and I believe that the House would pass it almost unanimously. [Applause.]

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OVERMYER].

Mr. OVERMYER. Mr. Chairman, I only wish to say a word in favor of this bill on behalf of the very large number of Spanish War widows and Spanish War veterans in my district. I believe that the destitute widow of a Spanish War veteran is just as destitute as any other destitute widow of a soldier. In other words, her needs, if she is destitute, are just as great as if she were the widow of a veteran of any other war. I believe that the test of patriotism to which a soldier must submit is determined not by the length of the service rendered, but the test is really made when he enlists and offers that service, and the fact that the Spanish War soldier did not serve so long or see so many battles is not the test by which to determine his patriotism.

At this time when talk of preparedness is heard on every hand it is especially proper that this Congress say to the young men of this country that if the necessity arises for them to offer their service this Government holds out the promise that in case of their death in that service the widow and orphans will be provided for.

Therefore, speaking for the very large number of Spanish War widows, some of whom I know are destitute, and speaking also for a very large number of Spanish War veterans, some of whom are inmates of the soldiers' home in my district and in such physical condition that in a few years more they will leave widows in very bad circumstances, I ask your support for this measure.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill. I feel that the widows of the men who rushed to the colors at the time of need, although they may marry the soldier, as some one has just said, just prior to the passage of this bill, are entitled to consideration at our hands. The same situation existed with reference to the widows under the Civil War pension bill, except that we have now moved away from 1890. After a while we will have moved away from the date this bill is passed, and then we will be looking back and will think the widows who married since that time ought to be pensioned. I think we have moved so far away from 1890 that there ought to be some provision, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has said, made for the widows who married soldiers since that date. I have in mind the case of a woman who married an old soldier in 1896. She is precluded from having a pension. We have been unable to get her one; and yet that poor woman to-day, having nursed her soldier husband for 18 years through a long spell of sickness, is dependent upon the aid of her friends and the city of Baltimore for support. I feel, therefore, that we have moved so far away from 1890 that some provision ought to be inserted, either in this bill or in some other one, which will make the provision suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. The Spanish War veterans rushed in at a time when the country was not prepared for war, and because of insanitary conditions which they had to live through many of them were disabled for life. I am in favor of this bill and hope that it will pass.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE].

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill for the reason that, to my mind, it is unjust to the men in the regular service. Let us take two men, say, living in the same community. One of them elects to go into civil life and one feels that the call of his country justifies his going into the regular service in time of peace. Each of them go about their respective vocations. A war breaks out. One of them has become prepared to render service to his country and goes on the battle field. The other is unprepared to render service, but goes to the colors. After the war is over neither one of them has been scratched; neither one has been injured; neither one has seen a battle field. Yet, Mr. Chairman, when both die we say that the widow and children of the man who went in time of peace and prepared himself to defend the flag and his country is entitled to no consideration, but that the family of the man who stayed in the quiet walks of life, who tried to amass a fortune, who disregarded the needs of his country, and who sought in no way to prepare himself, is entitled to consideration. I think that is very unjust. At this time, when this country, as the President has said, needs to put itself in condition to defend itself against the world, I ask if this Congress ought not to hesitate before heaping another burden of debt upon it, before increasing this pension list. This is no sectional speech that I am making. The people of my country will get the same benefits that the people of other parts of the Union will under this bill. I am besought from people in my country to engage with you in enacting this bill into law; but, Mr. Chairman, while I believe this country ought to stand for protecting the flag in the future, ought to stand for the men who to-day are enlisting and who are putting the country in a condition to protect itself in the future, because I honor and respect the men in the Regular Army, privates in the Army, and sailors in the Navy, and because I think legislation of this kind discriminates against them in favor of volunteers I oppose the legislation and think it is manifestly unjust and unfair.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask how much time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 28 minutes remaining.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a country like ours will never maintain a great standing army. There is no danger of so-called militarism in a people of our kind or in a country situated as we are, and yet the time may come when the people of a country like ours must fight, must be prepared to fight, and in the end whatever provision we may make for a Regular Army, or even for a National Guard, if we ever have much war we must depend upon the young boys who volunteer to give their lives for their country. [Applause.] And especially at this time, with the possibility—although I believe and hope not a probability—of entanglements abroad, it is quite appropriate that we should say to the people of our country, and especially to the younger men upon whom we must rely, "You offer us your lives when you enlist voluntarily, and, by the eternal, if you die we will take care of your widows." [Applause.]

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS].

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I very much approve of the provision in this bill that eliminates the necessity of the widow of a veteran of the Spanish-American War or of the Philippine insurrection proving that the death of her husband was occasioned by reason of disabilities incurred in the war. I have in mind one young man from my home town who enlisted in that service. In the Philippine Islands he was attacked with malaria and was in a hospital approximately six months. When he left his home with his company he was as fine a speciman of manhood as I ever saw. When he returned he was merely the shadow of his former self. Eventually in the course of time he contracted tuberculosis and died, leaving his family in absolute poverty. If that widow were compelled to prove that he died as the result of disability occasioned by his service in the Philippine Islands, she would not be able to do so, and yet, Mr. Chairman, death touched him in the islands. His vitality was destroyed; he was unable to combat the germs of tuberculosis that he might have mastered if he had been in his original health, and while she would have been unable to prove that his death was the result of a disability incurred in the islands, as a matter of fact his death was primarily caused by his service in that insurrection. More than that, the absolute poverty in which his family now live is the direct result of the illness that he contracted in the Philippines and that prevented him for months from such labor as he performed before his enlistment.

I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in that I would like to see returned to this House from the proper committee a bill which makes provision for the widows of soldiers of the War of the Rebellion who have married since the passage of the last pension law. I feel, Mr. Chairman, that there are many cases, probably every Member of this House is more or less familiar with them, of soldiers of the War of the Rebellion who would have been a public charge if it had not been for the kindness, the solicitous care, and attention that has been given them by wives whom they have married in recent years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SELLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I believe that I can perhaps speak for as many of the men who served their country in the War with Spain as anyone here. I have the honor to be at the head of the United Spanish War Veterans, the organization that is composed of those who thus served, and which includes the campaigns in Cuba, Porto Rico, the Philippines, and China, as well as the thousands who did not get an opportunity to leave this country. They were ready to go and were anxious to do so, but were not needed. They are entitled to as much consideration as those who did. Those who stayed suffered more than those who were fortunate to go. The fever-stricken camps in this country were worse for the men than the bullets. Many have died, and many more have lost their health due to those insanitary and ill-arranged camps. Yet the men who are living to-day are not here in this bill asking for themselves anything, but they ask you to remember the widows and the orphans of those who have died and who are in want. Many of the men who served their country with honor and credit and who are living to-day are broken in health as a result of that service, and but few of them are getting a pension. The Government should do justice to these men also, and without the asking and begging. The Government has failed in this respect in many deserving cases.

This bill, however, is not for them. It is only for the widows and orphans, and some of you, perhaps, would be surprised to know that there are many deserving of this consideration. You would be surprised to know of cases that have come to my attention of widows of soldiers who served their country with honor and credit in the Philippines, in Cuba, and in Porto Rico, too, who are to-day in dire poverty and distress.

We are hearing calls upon every hand to-day—from the President of the United States, from the Secretary of War, from the Secretary of the Navy, and from others high in official life—asking us to prepare our country for defense, and we understand and know that if we prepare our country for defense we must have men with which to do it. We may have the battleships, we may have the best guns it is possible to make, but, my colleagues of the House, unless you have men of character and of intelligence, such as we had in 1898 to 1902, to man these guns and ships, we can accomplish but little with them. [Applause.] And it is because the American Congress in the past and because it is to-day standing up for patriotism and for the men who served their country with honor that we are able in time of peace to raise an army as large as we want and need in this country. The War with Spain was not a very long war and it did not take a very great time to recruit all the men that were needed. The fact is, gentlemen, if we had had a trained army for this service against Spain the war would not have lasted so long. You can not recruit a well-drilled, disciplined, and efficient army in a little time, and especially when the equipment has been badly neglected.

And while I appeal to you to-day to vote for this bill in recognition of these women and children who are deserving, we also urge upon you, in the name of these men who served their country in the Spanish War and in the Philippines, we urge upon you in the name of 400,000 or more, to not wait until war comes before you start to prepare, but start now to train your men and get things ready in case war does come, so that diseases and the results of service will not be so serious to the men as they were to those who served in the Spanish War and the Philippines because of the conditions they had to encounter. [Applause.]

Mr. SELLS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Ours is the one great country that does not depend upon a great military establishment. I do not think the country ever will assume any such atmosphere of defense. While I believe in an increase of our national defense and will vote for any reasonable program of that kind, yet I am convinced we never will become a country whose defense depends wholly upon the regular arm. We will always have to depend upon the volunteer soldier, I am sure, in the midst of a great crisis. And while the volunteer does not hesitate on his duty nor ask whether there is going to be a pension given him when he returns, should he be so fortunate, I am sure that everyone does desire to know what may happen to his family, his wife and children, in case of his death. I think that this bill is in the right direction in continuing the policy we have always followed, to care for those dependent upon the soldier who, when he is gone, can no longer give support to those who have been dependent upon him. And for that reason I am sure that this legislation will meet with the approval of the American people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act if any officer or enlisted man who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States, either as a regular or volunteer, during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection or in China, between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive, service to be computed from date of enlistment to date of discharge, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, has died or shall hereafter die leaving a widow without means of support other than her daily labor, and an actual net income not exceeding $250 per year, or leaving a minor child or children under the age of 16 years, such widow shall upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his Army or Navy service, be placed on the pension roll from the date of the filing of her application therefor under this act, at the rate of $12 per month during her widowhood, and shall also be paid $2 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under 16 years of age, and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow, leaving a child or children of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16: Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of said child, or during the period of such disability, and shall commence from the date of application therefor after the passage of this act: Provided further, That said widow shall have married said officer or enlisted man previous to the passage of this act: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment in order to correct a typographical error.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment as it appears in the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, at the end of the line insert the word "volunteer."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 1, lines 5 and 6, strike out the words "either as a regular or volunteer."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to that amendment. By it you do a grave injustice to the soldiers of the Regular Army. I find that in the Spanish War no less than 234,000 enlisted men and officers of the Regular and Volunteer forces were not employed or failed to serve abroad. Of this number about 200,000 were volunteers. This bill makes the widows of every one of them pensionable, but the proposed amendment denies a pension to the widow of the Regular soldier who enlisted, prepared to face the music. Most of the Regulars, except the coast artillerymen, were sent to the front, but some were held back to do their duty at Army posts or for recruiting purposes and some were held back to suppress Indian disturbances. Can you offer any reason why widows of the latter should not be entitled to a pension, while widows of the 200,000 volunteers who did not leave their country should be entitled to a pension?

A good many of those volunteers never entered the service until July, and then, when the protocol was signed they were furloughed; and that furlough counts as service under this bill. Let me call your attention to the case I spoke of when the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] was speaking. I find that the Indian disturbance at Leech Lake, Minn., took place in October, 1898. I find that eight companies, or parts of eight companies, of the Third United States Infantry suppressed those Indian disturbances. Now, if any of those men have since died, unless they also saw service elsewhere, their widows will have no pensionable status under this amendment, whereas the widows of men in the other companies of the Third United States Infantry that were sent to Mobile and became part of the Fourth Army Corps, and subsequently were sent to Cuba, I believe, would be entitled to a pension.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Is it not true that the soldiers that the gentleman has in mind, who helped put down this rebellion, had just returned from Cuba? Had not all, or nearly all, of those soldiers seen service in Cuba before going up to Minnesota?

Mr. GARDNER. I have not any idea whether they had or had not been down to Cuba.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I think the gentleman will find that they had been.

Mr. GARDNER. I think it highly unlikely. But be that as it may, it would be unjust to draw a distinction between the widow of a regular soldier who did not serve outside of the United States and the widow of the volunteer just because there were 200,000 of us. Now, do justice to the widows of the Regulars.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is necessary to draw a line somewhere always. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] draws a much more arbitrary line than the bill does. It would be a much more arbitrary line to say that the Regular Army soldier who took no part at all in the War with Spain should be able to marry and leave a widow, who should draw a pension, but that the widow of the Regular Army soldier who happened to go into the Regular Army the next month, and who might have had just as much military service as the other one, should not have a pension. Unless we propose to pass a law giving to the widow of every Regular Army soldier at any time a widow's pension you have got to draw a line somewhere. I do not know any line that is safer to draw than to say: "We will grant a pension to the Regular Army soldier if he had service in the War with Spain; and if he did not, we will leave him on the same footing as we leave all other Regular Army soldiers."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER. Then why not leave the Volunteer who did not have actual service in the War with Spain on the same basis with those Regulars who were not fortunate enough to have been ordered to the front?

Mr. MANN. That is so easy to answer that I am going to answer it. We pay, or propose to pay, and have paid, pensions to widows of Volunteer soldiers, because we want it known that it is the policy of this country to take care of the widows of men who stepped into the Army out of private life, with no desire to make it their vocation, but solely to meet an emergency. [Applause.]

Now, the question of the Regular Army soldier is entirely different. If some one wishes to propose that, in order to induce men to enter the Regular Army, we shall pay pensions to their widows, that is a proposition which may be worthy of consideration. But it has nothing to do with the question now pending before the House. We inserted the provision last year that is now carried in this bill, for the Regular Army soldier who actually served in the war, as a concession, not desiring to draw the distinction at that time between the men who volunteered to go into the Volunteer service and the men who volunteered to go into the Regular Service; and those who volunteered to go into the Regular Service, in the main, received the benefit of this act, as they ought to. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. These men who went into the regular service offered their lives just exactly the same as any volunteer offered his life. Many of them when they enlisted could foresee that trouble with Spain was ahead of us. Do you suppose it was the pitiful $13 a month that these Regulars got which induced them to enter the service? Was it the fault of certain companies of the Third Infantry that they were held in Minnesota while other companies of the Third Infantry were incorporated into the Fourth Army Corps at Mobile? When a man was held back by his Government while his fellows were sent to Mobile, when he found that he must risk his life putting down an Indian outbreak, is his widow not to be pensioned when you are going to give pensions to the widows of some 200,000 of us Volunteers who, in spite of our readiness to do so, never received the coveted order to leave the United States during the Spanish War?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. DYER. I make the point of order that the amendment before the committee has been debated on both sides.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is there not also pending before the committee now a committee amendment which has not been disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] moved to strike out the last word.

Mr. DYER. He rose first to speak in opposition to the committee amendment, which has not been voted upon, and then he made another motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. RAGSDALE. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is still before the committee. I would like to be recognized to speak on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that in the consideration of this bill we are dividing the men who served in the United States Army, even in time of war, who rallied to the support of the flag, who offered their bodies in defense of their country, into two classes. The man who prepares himself, the man who gives up his money making, the man who goes in and equips himself, as the greatest military experts of this country are urging our young men to do, in time of peace, is treated as a machine and is to have no consideration. When the war breaks out, the call to the colors may take him right on the battle front. These men see service such as that in which they are engaged on the Mexican border to-day. They may be called to any part of the world to serve this Government. They may have to leave everything that they have behind them, and with the absolute knowledge that if they are in the service they can not escape. Yet we make this difference between them: The man who avoids preparing himself, who deliberately refuses to go into the Army or into the Marine Corps or into the Navy, the man who avoids giving any of his time to the country for the small pittance that we pay, that man is made a hero and a martyr, and we protect his widow and his children; but we say to the man who goes into the Army in time of peace and fits himself to be really efficient, the first man who goes to the front in time of war, the man who braves the dangers, and, as in the case of Mexico, settles the difficulty before the volunteer can even be called, we say to that man, "Unless you are absolutely wounded or killed you are entitled to no consideration." Why, Mr. Chairman, how can we have the Army that we ought to have? I have heard gentlemen on this floor state here that we could never have an Army unless service was made compulsory; that we could never have a larger Navy unless by conscription. I say, Mr. Chairman, that it is not fair that the men who give up professions and trades and agriculture to go into the service and fit themselves to be finished soldiers or sailors should be treated as machines, when they have qualified themselves to defend this country if the spark that the President has told us about should fall and set our country on fire, while to the man who delays and hangs back and does not fit himself we say, "Do not do anything for your country until the time comes, when you can not equip yourself in time, and then we will make of you a martyr and a hero and we will put your family on the pension roll." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARDNER) there were 89 ayes and 18 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that there is an amendment at the desk to the next committee amendment, and that will be considered first. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the committee amendment:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "twenty-first," strike out all down to and including the word "eight," in line 6, and insert in lieu thereof the words "eighteen ninety-eight," so that the amendment as amended will read, "or in China between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the committee amendment as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 10, after the word "discharge," insert "including all furloughs, or any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Establishment who rendered 90 days or more actual military or naval service in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection or in China between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the words "passage of this act," in line 3, page 3, and insert in lieu thereof the words "termination of said service."

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that amendment is to take away the handicap of an early marriage by these young widows, to encourage matrimony, and perhaps to save a little money for the Treasury of the United States. [Laughter.] I hope the amendment will be unanimously agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7, on page 1, after the word "insurrection," strike out the words "or in China."

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I would not offer the amendment if it were not for the fact that the committee's first amendment has been adopted, and therefore, in my opinion, warrants the amendment I have just offered. It will be observed that in the first paragraph in line 3, the word "volunteer" is inserted, and in lines 5 and 6 the words "either as a regular or volunteer" are stricken out. According to the language in the paragraph just referred to, it would read as follows: "That from and after the passage of this act if any volunteer, officer or enlisted man, who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection or in China," and so forth.

There were no volunteers serving in China during the Boxer rebellion in 1900, and my attention was called to that fact when I read the first paragraph. I have just returned from the telephone, where I consulted with The Adjutant General. He informs me that the only troops that served in China were the Sixth Cavalry, two squadrons; one battery of the Third Field Artillery; one battery of the Fifth Field Artillery; the Ninth Infantry; eight companies of the Fourteenth Infantry; four companies of the Eighteenth Infantry; and the Engineer, Signal, and Hospital Corps. All of these were regulars, and a gentleman from my own State, Brig. Gen. James H. Wilson, was second in command of the expedition, the late Gen. Chaffee being the first in command.

I ask the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY], if he will adopt this amendment, because, as it is now worded, the words "in China" are utterly superfluous and might lead to confusion. There were no volunteer troops serving in China. I would not have offered the amendment without consulting people who have served in this House longer than I have, and also the proper authority in the War Department. Of course if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] does not care to accept the amendment, I shall not press it. I offer it because I think the words are superfluous.

Mr. REAVIS. Does it apply also to the words in line 5, on page 2?

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. In reply to the gentleman from Nebraska, I will state that this does not apply to the words in line 5, on page 2, because the gentleman will observe the italics there deal with the Regular Army Establishment.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, if the information the gentleman received is correct, I would have no objection; but if there should be some mistake about the information he received, it might be an injustice to some volunteer who might have had that service.

Mr. MANN. I think it is quite certain that there were no Volunteers serving in China.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I have no objection to the amendment, and I accept it.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman what harm it would do if the words were left there?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I can not see what harm it would do.

Mr. MANN. It would be superfluous; but it would certainly be a reflection upon the intelligence of this House to pass a bill to provide for volunteer service of soldiers in China when there were no Volunteers there.

Mr. CARY. Suppose I were in China at that time and volunteered to join the Regulars?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's case would not be covered by this provision. It would be covered by the other provision.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think the language contained in lines 18 and 19, page 2, is a little ambiguous, and I doubt whether it states exactly what the committee intended. I refer to the language "and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow, leaving a child or children." How would the remarriage of a widow leave a child or children?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that I think this is an exact copy of the law in reference to the Civil War and that language has been construed until people now know what it means, though I am frank to confess that no one can read the language of that section and tell what it means offhand. It has been construed until the language is understood.

Mr. REAVIS. I offer the suggestion that it would be better to say "in case of the remarriage of the widow or the death of a widow leaving a child or children." There would be no ambiguity about that and it would not be subject to construction.

Mr. MANN. The whole language is ambiguous, but it has been construed until they know what it means.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the wording of this bill was taken verbatim from the act of June, 1890, and that has stood the test ever since the passage of the act. This is an identical copy of that. I do not see how they could go wrong on this.

Mr. REAVIS. May I ask the gentleman what construction was placed on the language "in case of the death or remarriage of the widow, leaving a child of children"?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. If the widow should remarry, the $12 which she would be receiving would go to the child, plus the $2 that the child would receive.

Mr. REAVIS. Then the construction placed upon it is that if the widow with children remarries the payment of the pension is transferred from the widow to the child?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Exactly; together with the $2 that the child would receive until the child arrives at the age of 16 years.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee if the words "daily labor," on page 2, line 9 of the bill, have been construed in other pension acts heretofore?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend section 1——

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the committee rose, and Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 54 and had come to no resolution thereon.

Whereas in countries now engaged in war there are several hundreds of thousands of Armenians in need of food, clothing, and shelter; and

Whereas great numbers of them have been required by conditions growing out of the state of war to leave their homes and their property, deprived of opportunity to make provision for their most elementary wants, causing starvation, disease, and untold suffering; and

Whereas the people of the United States of America have learned with sorrow of this terrible plight of great numbers of human beings and have most generously responded to the cry for help whenever such an appeal has reached them: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That, in view of the misery, wretchedness, and hardships which these people are suffering, the President of the United States be respectfully asked to designate a day on which the citizens of this country may give expression to their sympathy by contributing to the funds now being raised for the relief of the Armenians in the belligerent countries.

House resolution 136 (H. Rept. 164).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to consider in the House, as in the Committee of the Whole, House joint resolution 146.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the resolution is intended to take up immediately for consideration the resolution just offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN]. Of course, the effect of it is understood by every Member and that the House will proceed at once to consider House joint resolution No. 146.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have just been able to come on the floor, having been in committee. I understand the gentleman is proposing a rule to make in order a resolution authorizing the War Department to issue certain supplies and sustenance to people in the flooded area in the South. Is that true?

Mr. HENRY. Yes. This resolution No. 146.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN] came to the committee yesterday to see Mr. FITZGERALD, who was absent, and I undertook, through the medium of the Red Cross, to get accurate information touching the situation at certain places, because the information that we obtain from the War Department is not at all in harmony with the information that is being received by Members of the House from their respective communities. I hope to have that information very shortly. It seems to me, perhaps it might be wise if this matter could be held up pending some of this information. The War Department has had an understanding with the Committee on Appropriations, which is similar to that which has been had before in matters of this kind, whereby in case of need they would issue tents and supplies, not rations, and such issuance would be ratified and taken care of by subsequent action of the committee and Congress. I question whether we ought to now proceed without getting some of this information.

Mr. ASWELL. Does not the gentleman think the War Department would still exercise its judgment?

Mr. SHERLEY. Here is what I frankly think: The War Department is now exercising its judgment. It has an understanding by which it has acted heretofore and will act now, except as to rations. The passage of this resolution will be considered by the War Department practically as an instruction by Congress to go ahead and grant relief, whether the circumstances are such as to warrant national relief being given or not.

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman does not think the War Department would act in that way?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, just one moment. I think some gentlemen are acting under misapprehension in regard to this. Now, I want the House to have the benefit of full information. This resolution, No. 146, was reported to the House by unanimous consent from the Committee on Military Affairs. If action is to be taken at all it is necessary to take immediate action. Representatives came before the Committee on Rules this morning and made this case so strong, showing the urgent necessity for very prompt action, that the Committee on Rules, without any objection, authorized the report of this special rule for the immediate consideration of the resolution reported unanimously by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KETTNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. KETTNER. In answer to my friend from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] I received several telegrams from San Diego. I think the Members have all seen in the daily papers in Washington that San Diego County has been washed out from one end to the other. I took the matter up with the War Department, and here is a letter that I received from there. I will send it to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HENRY. This is not the San Diego case.

Mr. KETTNER. But this answers the same purpose.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the communication.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 22, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM KETTNER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. KETTNER: I beg leave to acknowledge receipt of your letter, without date, received in the department on January 21, 1916, quoting a telegram received by you from San Diego, Cal., requesting that the War Department loan 50 tents, with full equipment for living purposes, to the flood sufferers at San Ysidro, Cal., and to inform you that, in view of the joint resolution approved March 2, 1913, published in paragraph I, Bulletin No. 32, War Department, October 13, 1913, copy herewith, which limits the loan of tents to the Grand Army of the Republic and the United Confederate Veterans, it is impracticable to meet the wishes of the flood sufferers of San Ysidro.

Regretting my inability, under the circumstances, to give you a more favorable response, I am,

Very sincerely, yours, HENRY BRECKINRIDGE,
Assistant Secretary of War.

Mr. HENRY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman contends that action by Congress is necessary in order to do this?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is mistaken, notwithstanding the letter of the Assistant Secretary. I called Gen. Aleshire up yesterday, who has this matter directly in charge, and who is at the head of the Quartermaster Department, and I did that in the presence of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN]. We have had an understanding with that department. It is true it is informal and strictly not legal, but it has been the practical way of dealing, because at times circumstances arise by which a resolution would not be prompt enough. They did it in the past, and the gentleman will find from an examination of the RECORD that Congress twice has ratified action by the Quartermaster Department in issuing tents and supplies under that sort of understanding.

Mr. HENRY. What sort of supplies, may I ask?

Mr. SHERLEY. Tents and clothing and cots. The whole thing here involved is whether the Federal Government shall now determine to issue rations, and upon that I think the Congress is entitled to know whether the situation is a State and local matter that ought to be attended to by the State or whether it is a Federal matter that we ought to deal with.

Mr. HENRY. That will come up when the resolution is taken up for consideration.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the trouble with that is that at the instance of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN] I had a request made of the Red Cross to inquire particularly into certain counties where he claimed the situation is acute and where our information was not to that effect. Now, I think that the House ought to be in a position to receive that latest information.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The gentleman certainly does not mean to indicate to the House that I requested him to seek information from the Red Cross in the face of the flood of telegrams that I have received?

Mr. SHERLEY. No. I said that the information we had was contrary to that which he has been receiving. There have been put into the RECORD by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations repeated statements from the War Department. I said in view of that fact I believed we ought to get the latest information, and then asked of the gentleman from Arkansas, and the gentleman gave me, names of counties in his district and some in districts of his colleagues, in order that we might make specific inquiry and get specific answers.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will say in reply to the gentleman that I have no disposition to cut him off from any information that he may receive. I am not, however, responsible for his lack of information, because these matters have been pressing upon me, as well as upon other Members from that part of the country, and the situation has assumed not a local, but, as we think, a national aspect.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, there is no absence of information except of the very latest; and the information that has been put in this RECORD, and the information that was carried in one of the newspapers that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] brought to the attention of the chairman of the committee, was to the effect that there was no need of rations at this particular time. Other information came that men who were able to help were refusing to work except at the extreme prices they were asking for their labor.

Now, every man wants to do the proper thing. I know the pressure that comes upon individual Members. I have had to stand up under it for a week past, when telegrams from my State have come to me concerning the flood; and yet the localities there have largely taken care of that situation, some of them with the help of voluntary contributions from my own city.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. I yield.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Speaker, if the War Department has the discretionary power that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] claims it has, I want to bear personal testimony to the fact that it will not use it. On the receipt of that letter I called upon the Assistant Secretary of War——

Mr. HENRY. Let me ask the gentleman this question.

Mr. KETTNER. I explained to him the situation in San Diego County. They have an Army post there. They had the tents and everything there, within 20 miles of this flood. There were hundreds of families that were swept down the river, with no place to go, and he told me personally that he could not let us have the tents.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the point I want to make is this: If the War Department should take action without Congress passing this resolution it would have to be reimbursed for the funds expended, and therefore it would be exceeding its authority, and therefore this legislation is necessary. Is that the idea?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not necessarily. It is not only the issuing of the tents and cots, but issuing rations. The War Department will consider action on this resolution as a direction to issue, whether in their judgment the circumstances warrant it or not.

Mr. HENRY. I think the circumstances warrant it, and I think they should act at once.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is a matter for debate.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], I will say that Members of Congress from the stricken districts have frequently gone to the War Department in person and have telephoned down there repeatedly for tents and cots, and upon every occasion we have been told that owing to the act of Congress referred to in the letter by Mr. Breckinridge, the Assistant Secretary of War, the issue of such tents and cots upon all occasions has been forbidden, except upon one or two occasions when Congress granted the specific authority to lend the tents to ex-Confederate veterans and posts of the Grand Army of the Republic. They have cited to me the letter written to Mr. KETTNER. I am familiar with that letter. On every occasion they have told us they could not supply us with their tents and cots.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman know that yesterday we had a talk with the Quartermaster General, after which he made the statement that he had that understanding with the committee?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Yesterday afternoon, I will say in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, he talked with one arm of the War Department and so did I, and officials of that department said that under authority of the Committee on Appropriations it had power to grant tents and cots when it was in an emergency necessary. Still, prior to that time, we repeatedly conferred with the War Department, both in person and by phone, and we have been told repeatedly that these things could not be supplied by the War Department.

Mr. OLDFIELD and Mr. BARKLEY rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. I will yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD].

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some question here as to the need of supplies in the overflowed districts, and also some question as to whether or not the War Department has authority to take care of the situation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the most serious situation confronts the people of parts of Arkansas that has confronted us since the Civil War. Here is a telegram that I have just received:

CLARENDON, ARK., February 8, 1916.

W. A. OLDFIELD,
Washington, D. C.:

If appropriation for flood sufferers is made, we speak for Monroe County. Property loss is enormous all over south end of county. Clarendon almost washed away. Water from 6 to 15 feet over entire town. Prospects are it will stay up two or three weeks. Conditions awful. We need money to care for sufferers. Can we hope for any aid? Answer.

R. F. MILWEE,
Sheriff.
J. P. LEE.
H. B. BATEMAN.
T. E. BATEMAN.
J. F. HURST,
Postmaster.
JNO. B. MOORE.
W. L. JEFFRIES.

Mr. Milwee is the sheriff of Monroe County; Mr. Lee is ex-lieutenant governor of Arkansas; Mr. Hurst is the postmaster of Clarendon; and Mr. H. B. Bateman, Mr. T. E. Bateman, Mr. John B. Moore, and Mr. W. L. Jeffries are distinguished citizens of Monroe County. These gentlemen are on the ground and know the situation. They do not ask alms, but the flood conditions have gotten beyond their control, and the people need Federal aid.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen know the situation at Clarendon. It is a town of 4,000 people, the county seat of Monroe County. The water is from 6 to 15 feet deep over the city. It will take several days for the water to subside.

Mr. Speaker, no better people live anywhere than those whose names are signed to this telegram and I know they would not try to mislead Congress on this question which is so vital to our people. It makes no difference what the War Department says. The War Department has no representative at Clarendon. I think the officers of the War Department spend the most of their time on the Mississippi River, trying to keep the levees from breaking. I do not blame them because they no doubt are doing their duty as they see it, but they ought not to come here and try to prevent this House from giving needed and immediate relief.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this rule will be adopted, and then I trust the House will adopt the resolution providing for relief, and do it to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished officers of the War Department down in that section do request exactly what is covered by this joint resolution. I read from a letter inserted in the RECORD of February 8 by my colleague [Mr. FITZGERALD], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, found on page 2571:

VICKSBURG, MISS., February 5, 1916.

CENGWAR, Washington, D. C.:

In order to provide adequate shelter for persons flooded in Arkansas will need 200 tents. Can furnish employment which will permit all to subsist themselves without Government or charitable assistance. Would urge that matter be handled through this office in order not to demoralize labor and poorer class of whites.

SLATTERY.

That is precisely what this resolution does.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is a request for tents. This resolution authorizes rations, and they say they do not need them. Now, what is being urged here is that we should supply money to feed these people.

Mr. BENNET. This resolution authorizes all that is necessary, including rations, and if at a later time rations as well as tents become necessary, the resolution covers that. There is no use coming into this House twice with the same thing. I was somewhat surprised at the suggestion of the gentleman from Arkansas that an officer of this Government said that upon the authority of a committee of this House he would proceed——

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman ought to be fair.

Mr. BENNET. I am fair.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is not fair to do Gen. Aleshire an injustice. Gen. Aleshire did not seek such an understanding; but if the gentleman had had the experience that had come to the committee on previous occasions of this kind he would have realized the advantage of an understanding of that sort. Frequently a situation is only local. It may overnight develop into one where aid must be given, and the department could not give it unless it had an understanding that its action would be ratified, or unless it waited until Congress acted. The purpose of this understanding was really to facilitate the giving of relief when relief was necessary.

Mr. BENNET. I will repeat that I was surprised at the statement made by the gentleman from Arkansas, and I was about to say to the House that I presumed that what the Quartermaster General probably meant was this, which happens in well-regulated governments, that if he had the assurance of the committee having to do with appropriations that the item would be taken care of in a deficiency appropriation, he would cover it, because he would know very well, if he had that assurance, that this House would in the future, as it always has in the past, back up the Committee on Appropriations when it reported that deficiency. And, of course, he would also know that the other remedy would not be applied against him, and that there would be no attempt to impeach him for doing what he had no right to do with Government supplies; but I absolutely deny that any officer of the Government, without authority of Congress, has a right to divert one single ration from the purpose to which it is devoted by the statute. Now, what these gentlemen from Arkansas are trying to do is to proceed in a regular, legal way to accomplish what heretofore, under administrations with which I have had more political sympathy, we have gone ahead and done. I do not criticize anyone for doing it, because sometimes an emergency makes one wink at the exact statute, where the demands of humanity require it; but these gentlemen from Arkansas are seeking to go ahead in a legal way to do what this Government has done time and time again in the past, by forgetting the statute for a moment, relying on the good sense, patriotism, and judgment of the House of Representatives to make it good afterwards, as the House of Representatives has always done. We ought not to criticize the gentlemen from Arkansas, because they are seeking to have us go ahead legally, instead of going ahead extra legally.

Mr. SHERLEY. Nobody is criticizing the gentlemen from Arkansas. The whole question is one of fact, and it is perfectly manifest from the experience of every man who has had a situation of this kind in his own district that the telegrams which he gets always overstate instead of understating the situation, and that Congress, if it is not to be swept off its feet, must look somewhat to impartial reports touching the magnitude of the situation before it acts. Now, it is not a question simply as to whether there is suffering there. We all admit that. It is a question whether a sovereign State has such suffering in its midst that it is not able properly to take care of it, and should not be asked to take care of.

Mr. BENNET. I will read what Col. Townsend, the engineer officer in charge of the district, says. Certainly he can not be accused of sending an emotional appeal. This is the report of the Government officer:

In the White River district—

That is the district of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD]—

the waters from the Arkansas and White Rivers have flooded the country behind the levee for a long distance, so that it is impossible to obtain earth for levee protection without carrying it from one portion of the levee line to another, and I have limited high-water protection to the upper 40 miles and authorized an immediate expenditure of $25,000.

If the Government officer in charge of that work has authorized the immediate expenditure of $25,000, which evidently he has the statutory authority to do, for labor on the levees, the conditions there must be pretty bad.

Mr. SHERLEY. That does not prove anything.

Mr. BENNET. We are not putting the expenditure of this money into the hands of these local people at all. This joint resolution puts it in the hands of the Secretary of War and the Quartermaster General; and I, for one, am willing to trust the Quartermaster General of the United States that he will not improperly dispose of Government property. Of course, he will depend upon the reports of his officers on the ground, and I do not see how you can get any better evidence.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, he misses the whole point. It is not a question as to whether these people should be fed, but who shall feed them. The passage of this resolution will be taken by the War Department as an indication of the view of Congress that the Federal Government should feed them, and then the only question that they will determine will be whether there are people to be fed, and not the primary question whether the locality and the State are able to feed them.

Mr. BENNET. I know Col. Townsend and some of the other officers slightly. I do not think they are going to be swayed by emotion, or that they will consider this a direction by Congress. This is a permission. I will be frank to say in answer to the gentleman from Kentucky that if it does waste a few extra rations, I, for one, prefer to err on the side of humanity than to stand here and quibble over the question whether a few crackers are going to be wasted, when people are suffering for food.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we are trying to proceed in an orderly way. My recollection is that when the war broke out in Europe we were prompt in appropriating money to send over there and bring a lot of globe-trotters back home. I think the gentleman from Kentucky helped to pass that legislation through the House. The people at home are suffering, and they are entitled to relief which has been accorded hundreds of times. Let us do it with the authority of Congress, use the power of the people to extend relief to these people, and do it now. There is no use for any delay.

Mr. COX. And several years ago we sent $800,000 over to Italy.

Mr. HENRY. Yes; as the gentleman says, several years ago we sent $800,000 to Italy. Why should anybody halt and quibble one minute about this House exercising its authority. [Applause.] I yield now to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I want to supplement what the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] said. He read a telegram from Col. Townsend, whose headquarters are at St. Louis. If he had read the next telegram, which is one from Col. Dent, who is at Little Rock, Ark., on the ground, it would have shown this. He says:

No serious attempt to raise relief funds here. See no necessity for Federal aid.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to give the House some information which I have just received. I have just received through the committee the following statement which I have not yet myself read:

The Red Cross has a man in Arkansas in the Desha County district who has money. He is handling the situation as best he can. Local committee has some money, and it looks as though the situation can be taken care of. The number of destitute not reported as very great.

Also a man in the White River country at Peach Orchard and Cotton Plant with money.

An appeal from Perry, Mo., being handled by a man in southern Illinois, with money, and relief being given to five towns above Cairo that are in distress.

Hickman, Ky.: Sent money to local committee and had a man there. Relief given to six places in that vicinity. Flood going down at Hickman and report that mills will soon open and give employment.

A call from Natchez, Miss., on the Mississippi side. Committee there with money and have made tentative appeal to Red Cross.

The sums of money sent to the field have not been large.

Mr. ASWELL. Where is the money coming from?

Mr. SHERLEY. From the Red Cross people; some for Hickman County comes from Louisville.

Mr. ASWELL. Has the gentleman any idea of the amount of money that is there?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have not.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Louisville Courier-Journal of this morning contains an appeal to people of Louisville for money for Hickman County.

Mr. SHERLEY. And I have no doubt it will be met with the same generous spirit that has characterized my city in behalf of the people who are suffering.

Mr. BARKLEY. I hope it will.

Mr. ASWELL. I have just had a personal conference, Mr. Speaker, with the War Department, and I was informed that that department had no authority to act in this situation. I asked the pointed question, What effect would the passage of this resolution have on the situation? and I was informed that the passage of this resolution would immediately clarify the situation, and the War Department would welcome it. I do not for a moment believe that the War Department would do anything other than the wise and proper thing, and I think it unfair to suggest that the War Department would use any of the tents or provisions or spend any money unwisely. I earnestly urge the passage of this resolution.

Mr. SHERLEY. Nobody has made any such suggestion. The suggestion is whether they shall furnish the provisions or the localities.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, whether in an emergency of this kind the War Department has authority or has not ought not to be raised in the House or elsewhere, and in the past such a question has not been raised. If the War Department hesitates to exercise its discretion in the interest of humanity at this time, there should be no delay whatever in hastening this resolution to a speedy passage.

I recall that within recent years the War Department has exercised its discretion and has acted, and that action has not been questioned on the floor of the House or in any other body. I recall that during the fire in San Francisco the general in command there, Gen. Funston, took charge at once and used rations and tents and other equipment under that command for the needy individuals who were the victims of that great calamity. If there are camp equipments and rations within the reach of any of the sufferers of this flood, which is an incident of nature similar to an earthquake in its destruction, I see no reason why immediate action should not be taken by the department; and if the department hesitates, Congress should not hesitate to pass speedily a resolution granting the authority.

Mr. HENRY. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JACOWAY].

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Speaker, in discussing this resolution I desire to say to this House that the people of Arkansas are not beggars nor mendicants. The resolution presented to the House this morning is a resolution of vital interest to the people of the flooded districts of Arkansas, to the people of Missouri, to the people of Kentucky, to the people of Mississippi, and to the people of Louisiana. In these States recently the floods have wrought intense devastation to the people of these great Commonwealths.

I wish to say, further, that from the testimony adduced relative to this issue, in the form of telegrams from the governor of Arkansas and other State officers and daily press reports, when fully known and appreciated by this House and as recited in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and reflected in the daily press, show that we have a condition in these States that has gone far beyond the control of the people of these States. We feel that the National Government should give us the assistance as requested in the resolution, and give it to us now. [Applause.]

It has been given in times past to other sections of the country. I am not here to grudge the Federal aid given on former occasions to other great sections of our country. When you go into the record and let this body, sitting as a jury, judge what the testimony shows, you will be unalterably driven to the conclusion that the resolution is most meritorious and should pass and that we are justly entitled to same.

Mr. Speaker, in my district, in the city of Little Rock, we have two daily newspapers, both of them standing high in journalistic integrity, and what is reflected in the reports in those daily papers comes as a message to this House. I will not attempt to read all that is said in these newspapers, but I desire to quote a few of the headlines. In the Arkansas Gazette of February 6, 1916, I find on the front page the following headline:

Arkansas City inundated; may be swept away. All depends on whether weakened Mississippi River levees hold. Steamers stand by.

They are ready to give aid. In the Arkansas Democrat of February 5, 1916, I find the following:

Flood water now covers Lake Village.

Lake Village is a town of several thousand inhabitants.

Arkansas Gazette, February 7, 1916:

Fifteenth death in flood in Arkansas reported.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOWAY. In just a minute. In another column I find the following: "Get out of Clarendon, Cole warns." Clarendon is a populous and representative city of several thousand inhabitants. The people in that town are preparing to leave the city, and in fact are leaving, because they face a condition which is not local or provincial, but which is national in its scope. There are many more, but I think to quote same is unnecessary.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. JACOWAY. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is reading from some newspapers from Arkansas, and they are probably dated two or three days back.

Mr. JACOWAY. Yes; two or three days old.

Mr. BORLAND. What is the date of them?

Mr. JACOWAY. The 6th and 7th of February, 1916.

Mr. BORLAND. Did not the gentleman just hear the statement read from the Red Cross that the flood at Hickman was going down?

Mr. JACOWAY. That is down the river below.

Mr. BORLAND. Is not that much later than the information the gentleman has in those newspapers?

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I want to submit, further, that the Arkansas delegation in a body went down to the War Department and had a conference with Mr. Kingman, Chief of Engineers. Mr. Kingman stated that he did not want us to think that he was ungracious or unsympathetic, but stated he did not have the authority and said that before the War Department could act we would have to come first to this body and first pass the resolution clothing the War Department with proper authority to act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOWAY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has cited conditions at Clarendon as published in the local papers of the 6th. I wish to call his attention to a telegram from one of our Army officers at that point concerning this same place, Col. Dent, as published in the RECORD and found at page 2276:

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., February 6, 1916—9.06 p. m.

CENGWAR, Washington, D. C.:

Nothing alarming in situation at Clarendon. Inhabitants living in upper stories. No food shortage.

DENT.

I would like to ask the gentleman how that jibes with—well, I will not say sensational newspaper reports, but of course we all know that newspapers do indulge in sensationalism sometimes. Will the gentleman accept the statement of an officer of the Government or that which he finds in a newspaper?

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I will say in answer to the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin that when the people of any Commonwealth in this country are living in the upper stories of buildings as a result of flood conditions in their home town that the situation is grave and tends to show that the situation has gone beyond a condition local and in a way has become national. I take this bit of testimony he has presented himself, and on that alone I believe that the relief sought in this resolution should be given and accorded at once.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman from Texas yield so that I may quote some information that has just come to me?

Mr. HENRY. First I desire to yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL].

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say just a few words on this resolution. It occurs to me that if there is the necessity that all of us believe exists at the present time for the care of these sufferers, we ought not to be occupying the time of the House quibbling over the question as to who will feed these starving people. This Government ought not to stand upon any technicality when people are suffering and starving for the want of shelter and food. For one, I support this resolution, because I think it is one of humanity, and this Government ought to feed and shelter these people who are starving while we are here quibbling over the question of who shall give them food and shelter. [Applause.] It seems to me we ought not to be quibbling over these things, but we ought to pass this resolution promptly, and leave it to the War Department of our Government as to what is necessary and what should be furnished. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield now briefly to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to corroborate the testimony of the gentlemen who have spoken here with respect to the attitude which the War Department has assumed or occupied all of the time since this flood started, until perhaps yesterday, when, as my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] said, they yielded somewhat in their position. Last week almost daily I went to the department seeking assistance. The Assistant Secretary of War took the position that under the law he had no authority to do anything except to instruct the men in the Mississippi Valley to use whatever boats they might have to carry people out of the flood district. Repeatedly I carried telegrams to the War Department urging relief, and I was shown telegrams from Col. Markham and Col. Dent, purporting to give a report of the situation, which was entirely different from that given by the officers and others in the different localities where the flood existed. In the telegram from Col. Dent which has just been read, he seems to take the position that these people ought not to be assisted because the houses in which they live are two-story houses and they are in the upper stories, the lower stories being occupied by water.

In the telegram that Col. Markham sends from Memphis he takes the position that the people in Hickman ought not to be assisted because, for one reason, their houses are one-story houses, and they have been driven out of them entirely up into the hills back of the town. If there is that much difference of opinion between the Army officers as to the condition that would justify assistance by the Federal Government, I think, in view of the position the War Department has taken, that they have no authority to come to the rescue, either with tents or provisions, except by authority of Congress; that no harm can come and much good will result by the passage of this resolution. I am not willing to admit that the War Department officers who have been so vigilant and so punctilious in protecting the Federal Government without authority will abuse the authority that we propose to give them in the resolution now under consideration.

That has been the attitude they have taken heretofore, and, in view of the lack of any emotion that has been displayed by them in handling the situation thus far, I am not afraid that they will become unduly emotional and waste provisions or tents or other supplies of the Government if this joint resolution should become a law. I hope the resolution will be adopted, so that relief may go to those who are now suffering, or who may hereafter be caused to suffer, on account of the floods now devastating the valley of the Mississippi and her tributaries.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] to read a telegram.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I just received over the phone the following as a copy of a telegram received from Pittsburg, Miss., from Col. Beach. The telegram is as follows:

PITTSBURG, MISS., February 10.

CHIEF OF ENGINEERS:

Everything appears well in hand. Slattery's arrangement excellent, and handling of labor and aid situation superb. Morning paper reports resolution reported favorably by House Military Committee for tents and supplies. Earnestly recommend that measure either be not passed at this time or be so modified as to read "in discretion of Secretary of War," for prospect of free rations will demoralize labor situation and seriously interfere with success of fight to hold levees. Since starting this telegram report from Arkansas City received, containing following: "Reports as to starving refugees at Arkansas City are unfounded. Local levee boards are paying high wages to get labor at all. It is claimed with some foundation that the previous issue of free rations to negroes demoralized labor for such emergencies as this flood fight. The negroes have been holding back, expecting free rations. In fact that has been the expectation of negroes in Arkansas City. This to my knowledge."

Col. BEACH.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, just one moment. Now, all these things can be discussed on the merits of the joint resolution, and these gentlemen from Arkansas, Louisiana, and other States affected will have an abundance of convincing evidence on that question. We do not want the War Department to abuse their discretion in this matter. There is no controversy about the great suffering in Arkansas and other parts of the country, according to the telegrams received here to-day. Now I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] for just a moment.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I have a telegram from Adams County, on the Mississippi River, in my district. This is dated Natchez, Miss., and is as follows:

NATCHEZ, MISS., February 7.

Hon. PERCY E. QUIN, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Western portion of Jefferson County overflowed for past two weeks. Water still rising. Conditions growing worse daily, and will continue indefinitely. Supplies exhausted and people without shelter or means. Tents and rations needed immediately. Have Secretary of War wire adjutant general to ship 100 tents to Fayette. Please confer with our Senators and wire prospects of relief.

J. D. FRAZIER.
DUNBAR HUNT.
SANDY WOOD.
JEFF TRULY.

Here is another telegram:

NATCHEZ, MISS., February 7, 1916.

PERCY E. QUIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Hundreds of families destitute on overflowed lands in Jefferson, Adams, and Wilkinson Counties. Can't you possibly get some immediate Government relief?

C. R. BYRNES.

Now, gentlemen, these lands are overflowed by water. The levee across on the Louisiana side of the river is high, and the water rising up is washed down on the Mississippi side, and these people are destitute. These telegrams come from gentlemen of repute and character, and on such an occasion as this it strikes me Congress should give immediate relief.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I do.

Mr. HOWARD. Is this the first time this immediate section has been overflowed?

Mr. QUIN. No, sir; whenever the water gets high it overflows, because there is no levee there.

Mr. HOWARD. As a matter of fact, is it not true that the residents who live along on both the Louisiana and Mississippi side are temporary sojourners and expect a flood and can move out their belongings at any time?

Mr. QUIN. The gentleman is altogether mistaken. These people of these little villages and farms have their permanent residence there, and this water has risen and washed them away, and they have to go out into the hills, with nothing to eat and no shelter to cover them. What is the Federal Government for if it is not to give aid in such a distressed condition as those people are? [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, three counties of my district are largely within this submerged section. The Arkansas River and the Mississippi River are both throwing water over those counties or parts of them. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has read here a telegram from Col. Somebody as conveying flood information from Arkansas City. We have no Arkansas City in Arkansas. We have Arkansaw City. Arkansas City is in Kansas. We are about three or four hundred miles from that point. Now, I hold in my hand a telegram from Col. J. C. Cross, who is reputable, a high-class man, a gentleman standing equal if not superior to the gentleman who signed the message read by the gentleman from Kentucky. I want to read this message from Col. Cross and other gentlemen from Desha County, Ark. They are planters down in that flooded district. They say:

PINE BLUFF, ARK., February 7, 1916.

Hon. S. M. TAYLOR,
Member of Congress, 362 House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Many thousand acres of land in Desha and Lincoln Counties entirely submerged by overflow of the Arkansas and Mississippi Rivers. Twenty-five hundred people at least and 1,000 head of mules and cattle now on the levee with nothing to eat and no shelter. Unless assistance can come at once, they must starve and die from exposure to weather. The greater part of people are negroes, who have been living in the lowlands, where the water is now from 6 to 15 feet deep. There are no boats to take them to high ground and they must stay where they are until waters recede sufficiently to enable them to get out. This will take at least three weeks if food can not be furnished.

They state it will take at least three weeks for the water to recede. I hold in my hand a newspaper from my district saying that it will take a month. The telegram from Col. Cross and others further says:

We fear that the loss of life and property will be appalling. We appeal to you to see if food can not be supplied at once. Pendleton Landing is about the only place where distribution can be made. The larger part of the sufferers are within a few miles of it.

WM. MORGAN.

I also call attention to the following telegrams sent to Senator ROBINSON and which he has just handed me:

LAKE VILLAGE, ARK., February 5, 1916.

Senator JOE T. ROBINSON,
Washington, D. C.:

Most disastrous flood in history of Chicot County is now on us. The water is higher and covers greater area than ever before. Four thousand people hungry, homeless, and destitute, and need immediate aid and sustenance. Several hundred at Gaines Landing to-night shivering on the levee, without food and shelter. Unless Congress makes provision for immediate relief many will perish from cold, hunger, and neglect. Local authorities and organizations totally unable to cope with the situation. Confer with War Department and secure requisition rations for 4,000 people for two weeks, to be delivered at Vaucluse Landing as quickly as possible. Other requisitions, rations for 4,000 people for two weeks, to be delivered at Vaucluse Landing as quickly as possible. Other requisitions must necessarily follow.

M. M. Norton, M. D., county health officer; George E. Booth, M. D., county coroner; J. B. Sims, vice president Chicot Bank & Trust Co.; William Yerger, mayor of Lake Village; Sam Epstein, manager; Percy Sanders, manager, Gaines Landing; Wilson Bros., merchants, Luna Landing; W. H. Carpenter, manager; F. O. Anders, manager, Macon Lake; Roy Johnson, planter, Sunnyside; F. H. Dantzler, planter, Red Leaf; Jones & Dunn, mills and timber; Jennie A. L. Mills, Chicot; Harry E. Sook, county judge.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] talks about the demoralization of labor. Of course it is demoralized, because they are in flood water. In such condition the Kentuckian would be demoralized. They are unable to get anywhere or to do anything. There is no work for them to do, and when the gentleman who wrote the message read by the gentleman from Kentucky talks about labor being demoralized he is talking through his hat. [Applause.] These people are fighting for life and for subsistence [applause] and trying to care for their wives and their children. [Applause.]

Such is the situation, gentlemen. Now, this affliction extends for 150 or 200 miles up and down the Mississippi River and nearly from the city of Pine Bluff down to the Mississippi, a distance of ninety and odd miles. It is a hard and mournful situation, as indicated to me by telegrams from the stricken section.

Mr. Speaker, I have stood upon this floor and voted for every appeal for suffering humanity that has come before the Congress since I have been honored with a seat in this House. Here is a helpless people, composed of white citizens and negroes, some, I am told, sitting on the tops of floating houses, some lying on the shelves of stores that are flooded. If you will turn to my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the 3d of this month and read there the telegrams I have placed in the RECORD, you will have some idea of the awful situation. I have dozens of other telegrams I might read. I do not think it necessary to do so. Adopt this rule and pass the resolution. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BRUMBAUGH].

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, I want to say, gentlemen, that regardless of any letters or reports of any kind from the War Department or from men on the ground, regardless of all that, I will take great pleasure in voting for this resolution. No man who has ever seen or lived in a flood-swept district can have the heart to do otherwise. I want to call your attention to this fact, gentlemen, that after the waters have subsided and the earth appears to view again, you will then witness an awful condititon of affairs, such as we had at Columbus, and many other places in Ohio, when 3 miles wide of that beautiful city was swept by an awful flood, leaving not a building of any description that anyone could occupy. These unfortunate people in Arkansas, Mississippi, Kentucky, Louisiana, and elsewhere will have nothing left to them but destroyed property, destroyed homes, and destroyed lives when the sky kisses the earth again. In such an emergency as this, happen anywhere it may, there is nothing too good for this Government to do for its stricken people whenever any calamity of this kind befalls any part of our common country. Here and now is the time to show that one touch of human nature that makes the whole world akin. Let us vote and not talk longer, and vote to send a ray of hope and a helping hand to our suffering neighbors in a stricken land.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I only wish to make a statement. The people that we represent are not beggars. They are not asking relief in the sense that they are begging charity. They want merely that we shall tell you their condition, and then you shall be the judge of whether you want to relieve that condition or let them die of want. Take the part of our State which is devastated by this flood, you will find there are points that are 25 miles from any town with a population of 2,000 people, and of that population possibly not 20 per cent are white. The rural population is practically all colored. They are a rather improvident people. They do not lay up much for a condition such as this. And we are not now asking you to relieve to any very large extent the misfortune that has overtaken the white people in that country. We are asking you to help care for the people who live so remotely from the towns and in parts of the country where the entire resources have been swept away and where local resources can not relieve the condition. A third of the county in which I live is under water, but we have a part of it which is inhabited by white people that is not overflowed, and we do not want there a cent of relief from the Federal Government. I have people in my district who have gone into their pockets and paid out for relief of distressed people under this condition, where the entire relief went to the colored race, a greater sum than the profits of a year's labor. We ask only that those who are entirely destitute be helped. No other would accept it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to this rule, because I think that this resolution to which it relates, if amended, should be adopted, because I think the War Department ought to have authority not only in this particular case but in all cases of flood suffering, to loan the tents and equipment of the Government. But, Mr. Speaker, it is well now to call attention to the fact that the State of Arkansas, so far as any evidence appears that has been brought before this House, has not attempted to do anything as a State government to relieve the situation there. And I do insist, that so far——

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. The Legislature of the State of Arkansas is not in session and the governor has no authority in the absence of the regular session of the legislature.

Mr. LENROOT. How about the adjutant general of your State?

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. He has no funds in his hands.

Mr. LENROOT. It is a most curious situation if there is any State in this Union where there is no way of calling a special session of the legislature to take care of a special emergency in that State. So far as the evidence before the House is concerned, there has been no attempt in the State of Arkansas by anybody to furnish relief to take care of this situation. I am speaking of the gentleman's telegrams.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. If I have time enough.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. HENRY. I can not yield further in two minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. I am stating this preliminarily, so that the House when it comes to the consideration of the resolution itself and the amendments that I hope will be proposed to it, will have in mind some facts in connection with this matter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a great many telegrams have been produced from the State of Arkansas asking for relief.

One of the Arkansas Members two or three days ago showed me a number of those telegrams. He did not show them to me in confidence, nor for the purpose of informing me of the fact I am about to refer to; but I feel perfectly at liberty to state one fact in connection with those telegrams. With one exception, every telegram that the gentleman showed me, appealing to this Government for relief, was sent "Collect, Government," and a telegram from the governor of the State of Arkansas himself was sent "Collect." [Applause.] This means that the Government has to pay even for the telegrams asking for relief.

Now, the Members of this House can draw their own inferences from those telegrams. I am not criticizing the Arkansas delegation in making this effort to get all the money they can and relieve their own State and the people of their own State from doing what they ought to do in a case like this; but it is due to the House to know that apparently the appeal comes primarily from the activities of the Arkansas delegation in this House and not from the spontaneous appeal of the people of the State of Arkansas. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] moves the previous question on the rule.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution embodying the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 136.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to consider in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House joint resolution 146.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the House joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 146) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan, issue, or use quartermaster's and medical supplies for the relief of destitute persons in the districts overflowed by the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

Whereas the recent disastrous floods of the Mississippi River and its tributaries have overflowed certain districts, causing the loss of much property and rendering many persons homeless and temporarily without means of support: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan, issue, or use such tents, provisions, and supplies pertaining to the Quartermaster's and Medical Departments of the Army, from any stores now on hand, as he may deem necessary for the temporary relief of destitute persons in need of the same in the districts overflowed by the recent floods of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, under such regulations for the care and return of articles not consumed in the use as he may deem necessary.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. How does this resolution now come before the House?

The SPEAKER. Under the rule. The rule was that immediately upon the passage of the resolution the House joint resolution should be taken up and considered.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker had better look at the rule.

The SPEAKER. The rule says:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to consider in the House, as in the Committee of the Whole, House joint resolution 146.

Mr. MANN. Does not that require somebody to call it up? It is in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is right.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I call up House joint resolution 146, and ask its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

House joint resolution 146 was again read, with a committee amendment striking out the preamble.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I want to offer an amendment. I will do it after the committee amendment is disposed of.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the committee amendment is to the preamble. It will be acted upon after the other.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the question of the amendment is not yet in order. General debate has not been had on the resolution at all.

The SPEAKER. There will not be any general debate on it, either. The rule provides that it shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERLEY. That would not interfere with debate.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, the committee amendment merely strikes out the preamble.

Mr. KETTNER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. KETTNER. To inquire if it is in order to offer an amendment at this time.

The SPEAKER. It will be as soon as we dispose of this other one. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, has the committee amendment been agreed to?

The SPEAKER. No. It has not been voted on. The committee amendment is to the preamble. If the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] wishes to offer an amendment, we will hear him.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, by striking out, in line 4, page 1, the word "provisions."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 4, by striking out the word "provisions."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman why he wants to strike that out.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Am I recognized, Mr. Speaker, to speak to the amendment?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I yield to no man in my interest in the subject matter of this resolution. I will state to the House that I live now and have always lived in the overflowed section of the Yazoo Delta. My home is about four blocks from the levee, and the water stands to-day on the outer side of that levee 12 feet higher than the town. All the property I own is within a few miles of the Mississippi levee. I have lived there, as I say, all my life. It is 65 miles from my home to the first hill. I have passed through many floods. No man on the floor of this House has had more personal experience in these disastrous floods than I have had.

I recognize the frightful conditions that obtain in these great deltas whenever the floods in the Mississippi River occur, involving a loss of life and a loss of property, and I have devoted 13 years of service in this House to an effort to obtain from the Federal Government that assistance which I thought was due from the Federal Government, in cooperation with the people of those lower deltas, to make impossible, or at least remotely possible, the recurrence of such disasters as have come down the river in the past and such as is upon us to-day.

But, Mr. Speaker, we have it from a poet 2,000 years ago that "the gods have destroyed whole families by answering their prayers." I have seen Government rations issued time and time again.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Is the gentleman aware of any similar resolution having passed this House striking out "provisions," providing food and provisions in the past in the case of disasters like this?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Am I aware that such a thing was done?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Yes; is the gentleman aware of a case where the Government did not provide provisions on former occasions?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I am not aware of such action.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. On sundry occasions the Government did buy rations for the Mississippi flood sufferers. Has not the Government always done that?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I think it is almost universal. I do not know of any exception.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Does the gentleman give any reason why he thinks the Congress at this time should make an exception to that time-honored rule?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. If the gentleman will possess his soul in patience, I will endeavor to do that, as I was endeavoring to do it when he interrupted me.

I have seen these floods come time and again, and I say there is no man upon this floor who has had the personal experience in this matter through as many years as I have. Many times we have issued rations, and it may be that it will be necessary for us to do so hereafter; but it has been my experience, observation, and information from innumerable sources among the people in that section that the issuance of Government rations has done more harm than good.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The district which I represent in Congress is, 95 per cent of it in area, subject to overflow from the Mississippi River.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; not just at present. There is but one part of 1 county out of 10 counties in my district that is not subject to overflow. It is my deliberate opinion that the great mass of the people in those deltas do not want the Government to issue rations or to hold out the expectation that it is going to issue rations; certainly not until this disaster becomes so universal that the people and authorities in that district and the State authorities proclaim to the world that they have done all that it is possible for them to do, and that they now ask us for help. In my opinion, the resolution ought to be adopted if this provision for the issuance of rations is stricken out, because it will authorize the Secretary of War to use tents and supplies in the quartermaster's and medical department that are necessary; and if that is done I believe the Congress will have done all that can reasonably be asked of it.

The legislature of my State is in session, and it passed a resolution the other day setting out that whereas three counties—naming them; counties in my congressional district—were overflowed, and so forth, therefore be it resolved that the Representatives in Congress are requested to get authority granted the War Department, so that the National Guard of the State may use its tents, equipment, and so forth, in case of need. Nothing was mentioned about rations. No request came from them for rations. So far as I know, no request was preferred to the legislature of the State even for rations.

I hesitate, of course, to stand here and appear to be willing to deprive needy people anywhere of assistance of this sort, if it is really necessary, and if it is up to the Federal Government to do it; but I feel that I have a responsible duty to perform here to the House. I have lived there, as I say, all of my life. I believe I know what the conditions are, and I do not believe rations ought to be provided. If that one word were stricken out, I have no doubt this resolution would pass by a unanimous vote, and I hope the House will so pass it.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In a moment. I could read newspaper reports, if reliance is to be placed on such information. I notice here a telephone message from the sheriff at Clarendon, Ark., to the Memphis Commercial Appeal of February 7, in which he says, among other things:

> Supplies are apparently sufficient. Insufficient time has elapsed to develop a food famine. From what I can learn everybody is well fixed in this respect.

A telegram in the issue of the same paper of the 8th instant from McGehee, Ark., says the same thing. A telegram from the commercial club at Marianna, Ark., says the same thing. But I am not taking issue with the gentleman on that score. I believe I speak with as much personal knowledge on the subject as any gentleman can, and I say that this is not the time to announce that we are going to furnish Government rations; and I remind gentlemen once more that we may be repeating the experience of long ago, when the gods destroyed whole families by answering their prayers.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I yield for a question.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I simply want to ask the gentleman whether, in opposing Government rations to flood sufferers at the present time, it would shut off himself and others who sympathized with him at this juncture from asking aid in the future?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Nobody is doing that. This may be necessary in the future, but I say it is not necessary now.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues have stated here that the people of our State are not beggars nor mendicants. I have not read into the RECORD nor have I shown to Members of the House one tithe of the telegrams and letters which I have received which reflect that not a local, but a national disaster is upon the people of that section of the country. The people of southeastern and eastern Arkansas are not only overwhelmed by floods, but portions of Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, Missouri, and Mississippi are likewise afflicted. I have telegrams here galore from people as reliable and truthful and honorable as any Army colonel the opposition may quote who say that thousands of people are on housetops and on the levees and living in tree tops. Their property has been swept away, their live stock lost and destroyed, their storehouses and all have been swept away, and one whole county in my district is now under water. Nine or ten parishes of Louisiana south of that county are likewise inundated.

The people down there are not alarmists. They are not beggars. They are paying from year to year a most heavy levee tax. Since I came here five years ago this is the third flood that has swept over Chicot County. In 1911 and 1912 they made very little, if any, crops in some sections of my district.

In the western part of my district, on the Red River, the same condition exists. The Red River has been on a rampage, on a veritable spree, so to speak, for the past 12 months. Last year there were six big overflows in Arkansas and in parts of Louisiana from Red River, and in the year 1915 I am told that not 1,000 acres of crops were grown between Fulton, Ark., and Shreveport, La., a distance of 260 miles. That country to-day is likewise inundated, and the property owners down there have been supporting not only themselves but their tenants and the negroes upon the farms. They are not asking alms and gratuities from this Government. They are great, big, broad, generous people, who would scorn the alms of the Federal Treasury unless an emergency existed.

Four years ago there were some supplies sent in there, in a part of Ashley County, which adjoins Chicot on the east, and some of those people wrote me that they did not appreciate the fact that the Government had sent those supplies in there, because they were well enough prepared to take care of their own, and they scorned the beneficence of the Government. But those same people to-day, Mr. Speaker, and the people all over that section of the country are knocking at the doors of Congress for relief.

Many people have been drowned already in that section of the country. The live stock has practically all perished, and women and children are on the levees, on the tops of houses exposed to the raging winds and the rainfalls. It has been awfully cold down there for the past 10 days. Little children are clinging to their mothers' breasts and mothers are clinging to anything they can lay hands upon to sustain themselves. Little children are crying in the night with no language but a cry, and yet gentlemen stand here on this floor turning a deaf ear to their importunities, while the great strong arm of the Government could reach out and rescue these people thus distressed if permitted so to do.

I am surprised at the attitude my good friend and neighbor from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] has taken. As suggested by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ], he is setting a precedent and forever foreclosing the door against his own people who may at some future time be likewise afflicted. Fortunately the people on the Mississippi side have levees bigger, broader, and higher than they are on our side. But, Mr. Speaker, it is not merely a local situation on the Mississippi River that confronts us. The Mississippi River carries down all the water that flows between the Alleghenies and the Rockies.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I ask for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman think it would be fair to permit thousands of people to suffer merely because the Government rations might disorganize a few colored laborers?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Why, certainly not. That is a puerile argument. I am a white man, but there are some men in this country who think just because a negro is a negro he must never be permitted to get his head above water, although by his labor he may create wealth for others. I do not think that that argument should be dignified by an answer.

I was about to say, when interrupted, that this is not a local question. Nearly one-half of the water that falls in the United States comes down that great artery, the Mississippi River. It carries the water of 31 States, and therefore it is not a local question, it is not a provincial question, but it is a great national proposition, and it behooves this body of men whose impulse of generosity should go out to a stricken people to aid them in their distress. I have some pride, I think, in the district I represent. I think I represent a pretty broad-gauged, liberal, and intelligent constituency. I voted to come to the rescue of the stricken people of Salem, Mass., when that great fire swept over the city and threw thousands of poor people out of employment by burning the factories in which they labored and driving them from their homes which had been consumed by the flames, and I did it gladly. This Congress has repeatedly come to the rescue of people who have been bereaved and stricken by the hand of Providence, not only in the United States but in countries abroad. In our liberality we have looked across the seas into the lands of all climes where humanity has been afflicted.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I want to ask the gentleman, if conditions are as serious as he describes, does he not think it of sufficient importance for the governor to call a special session of the legislature to take some action?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Under our constitution down there no legislature of our State can be convened without first giving notice of 30 days, and by that time some of the people would be swept from the earth and buried face downward for all time.

Now, it is said that the governor of our State sent a telegram up here without paying the charges. That may possibly be so, and if so, doubtless it was an oversight in giving it to his clerk without prepaying same. Such things are frankable. But that is a puerile argument that does not arise to the dignity of this occasion. I have a telegram that shows that in Chicot County alone, where five towns were not able to be heard from on account of the wires being down, there are 5,500 people who are on the levees and on tops of houses—men, women, and children, with their property swept away, their live stock gone, and in want of food. I only speak of one county in describing that aspect of the case. North of my county is Desha, through which the Arkansas River runs, going through the very heart of Arkansas, and which finds its confluence just above Arkansas City. Thus far the levees of the Mississippi have remained intact, but the great body of water coming down from the Arkansas has swept over a part of Jefferson, Desha, and Chicot Counties, and a part of Ashley County, and a dozen or so parishes in northeastern Louisiana, at least that is my information. I submit that this is not a local proposition but is a national question. It is a part of that great question of conservation, to conserve the lives of the people. In times past, Mr. Speaker, we have sought to protect the property rights of the people, and legislation has gone far to conserve property rights, but, unfortunately, legislators have not been so generous in conserving human rights. [Applause.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the adoption of this amendment, and if the amendment is adopted it will permit the Secretary of War to loan the tents of the Government and such supplies other than provisions as he may think necessary to relieve the situation in the State of Arkansas from the floods of the Mississippi River. But it will not permit the Secretary of War to furnish provisions, and the Secretary of War ought not to be permitted to go to that extent on the showing made to-day. Before the National Government should be called upon to go to the extent of feeding the people of the State in which the situation arises, the State itself should do something.

The State of Arkansas has not even attempted to take care of what these gentlemen claim is a great emergency. The gentleman states that under their constitution it would require 30 days' notice to call a special session of the legislature. Why, if any such emergency as the gentlemen would have us believe exists, does anyone believe that the governor of any State, Arkansas or any other, would not find means to get men of wealth in that State to come together and advance money to help take care of the situation, knowing that in such emergency the legislature as soon as it was called would reimburse them?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I can not yield in the time I have.

In any State other than Arkansas, at least, with any such emergency as gentlemen would have us believe exists, organized relief societies would be formed and provision made for relief of those who are suffering and destitute, and yet not one word of evidence is placed before this House that anything of the kind is attempted. It means just this: We might as well realize the fact that if because of a local situation the State and the people of the State are to be relieved of all responsibility of taking care of their own people, then we will meet this situation not only this year but next year and every year, not only in the Mississippi Valley, but wherever a flood occurs.

In San Diego County, Cal., there has been a situation within the past two weeks infinitely worse than anybody has attempted to show exists in the State of Arkansas to-day, and yet there has been no attempt to secure the issue of food and rations there; and until these gentlemen show that their State and the people of their State have, at least, done something to relieve the situation that exists they are not justified in calling upon the Federal Government to take care in whole of what they should at least have taken care of in part themselves. It has been said there have been hundreds of cases of a similar nature to this. I have before me the cases where relief has been given since 1812. There are some 30 of them. Only once in the last 19 years has any relief of this kind been granted, and yet every Member of this House knows that within that time there have been many floods in the Mississippi River very much greater than that which exists to-day.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I can not yield in the time I have. If we are going to start out on this policy, including the furnishing of rations, then we ought, whenever there is any suffering anywhere in any part of the country, to adopt the same plan and say now that wherever there is any destitution or suffering we will relieve the States and the people of the States from attempting to relieve that suffering and they can come to the Federal Treasury and get all they need. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am very much in favor of adopting the amendment striking out the word "provisions."

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I very much sympathize with those destitute and distressed people down along the Mississippi River, and it makes me weary to listen to a speech like that just delivered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. I saw this House appropriate $200,000 for relief at Salem, Mass., and I never heard the gentleman from Wisconsin call for the State Legislature of Massachusetts to be assembled on that occasion. I saw money appropriated, I believe $3,000,000, for relief for the earthquake sufferers of San Francisco, and the gentleman's lips were sealed upon that occasion, for he did not ask that the Legislature of California be assembled to provide for relief out there. I saw the people in the Ohio Valley in distress, when the flood raged there a year or so ago, and Congress granted relief, but the gentleman's eloquent voice was not heard then asking that the Legislature of Ohio be called in extra session. [Applause.] I voted for these relief measures. Gentlemen on this side voted in the main for those relief measures. I have no prejudice in my heart against any section of our great country. If I know my own heart, I would vote for relief for any of our people in distress anywhere beneath Old Glory's folds in this Republic. [Applause.] I have proven it by my conduct; and it makes me weary, I repeat, to have the gentleman from Wisconsin stand up here and undertake to split hairs when people are working day and night, without taking their clothes off, in the water, wet and hungry, doing their best to save themselves and their homes, while gentlemen here are burning time and halting about giving the relief that they ask. Why, the Senate passed a resolution a day or so ago granting them $100,000 for immediate relief, and did it by a unanimous vote. No voice there was raised in opposition to it. But at this end of the Capitol gentlemen must stand here and hinder in every way that they can this meritorious measure of relief. I am in favor of this resolution as it stands. I am opposed to striking out the word "provisions." The resolution provides that the Secretary of War shall use these things for the temporary relief of the destitute persons in the Mississippi Valley. Gentlemen, will you grant this relief or will you refuse to go to the rescue of white men and negro men who are doing their utmost to keep these floods from their doors and from sweeping away their property and destroying human lives? Let us rise to our duty and join hands about a common center for the relief of these sorely distressed people in the Mississippi Valley. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I have sat here in absolute amazement and listened to the speeches of these men who have the temerity to oppose relief to the people in that flooded district who are in distress, driven from their homes, their beds washed out from under them in the nighttime, provisions all gone, water destroying them, fleeing up into the hills with their children and little babies in arms, with nothing to eat, no place to sleep. It amazes me to know that men would not want the Government to protect and succor such distress. The gentleman said he did not object to these people having tents.

My distinguished colleague whom I love, Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi, said he was willing to let them have tents and medicine, but he is opposed to them getting provisions. My God, gentlemen, what good will tents do a man, what good will medicine do a child, when their bellies are empty, gnawing, and hungry? [Applause.] Why, nothing. We had better have some common sense about it. This great Government has reached out its strong arm and protected our citizens across the seas. This great Government sent a great sum of money to Europe last year to bring back the globe trotters into this Republic, and you know thousands of them have never yet paid a dollar of it back. Who of you voted against that resolution and that appropriation, but here in this country, where the people are in distress, where real starvation is staring them in the face, you can not give a little pittance to feed them while they are hungry and to shelter them in this cold and bleak winter. It seems to me that it is heartless. I do not want to refer to my distinguished friend here, but he said that in his judgment it disorganizes labor. Do you mean to say that some great employer does not want the poor people to receive relief simply because some of his labor might not be there to go to work on Monday morning? That kind of sentiment, gentlemen, ought not to reach the Halls of the United States Capitol.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I have not the time; excuse me. I wish to say that these hundreds of families in my district that have been run out of their homes, and often in the nighttime, by the Mississippi River floods, are not mendicants nor beggars. Some of them are white people and some of them are black people. They are poor, and by the love of God I am going to vote for the aid of the poor in distress on every occasion and everywhere. I voted, I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, to give Government aid, and we did it, to the poor people who had been burned out of their homes in a tenement city of Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I have not the time to yield. I voted for giving aid and to send seed into the State of Texas when the flood waters had wrecked and ruined the poor farmers along one of its rivers.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. QUIN. I have not the time. In this case we have water instead of fire, and I wish to ask the gentleman which is worse, fire or water? If your house burns down, you can get out of it, but whenever the great Mississippi starts down with its great torrents people ofttimes are drowned and their live stock is drowned and their land has great gullies and sand bars washed into it; and while that great river—more than a mile wide down in my district—has levees on the west, there are none on the east side of the river, and when it rises up the high banks the levees on the west sweep the water down over the fertile lands on the east side, comprising a portion of my district, and washes these people out of their homes, washes away their dwelling houses and their barns, and while their little children are crying for food Congressmen here heckle and stickle over technicalities while the people are starving. The Humphreys amendment ought to be defeated and the resolution passed right now. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker——

[Cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. All time has expired on this amendment.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks and also to incorporate certain telegrams.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. If gentlemen will not observe the rule they will have to take the consequences. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order. There is a motion to strike out one word and that is all there is.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order. A motion to strike out the last word of the bill is not in order. There is only one word in the amendment which is before the House.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute to the amendment, to strike out the words "provisions and supplies."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I have no idea of urging the striking out of the word "supplies," because they will want tents, medical supplies, and so forth, but I do want to say something on this principal resolution, this amendment. Unless the House is swept away by this torrent of oratory and sentiment it will certainly vote to adopt the amendment to strike out the word "provisions." There is extreme difference of opinion between the experts who are on the ground representing the Red Cross and the Federal Government and political officials of the different communities as to the necessity for this relief. The demand comes in urgent, imperative, and mandatory terms from the political officials of these communities that the Federal Government must give relief, but the officials of the Federal Government who are on the ground say that relief, especially to the extent of granting provisions, will be demoralizing to the work they have in hand, so that there is a very distinct difference of opinion.

The officials of the War Department who are stationed in the flooded district telegraph to our Appropriations Committee that they are in dire need of labor to save the levees from destruction, and that they can not get the labor because word has gone out among the colored people there that the Federal Government is about to issue free rations. We know that the emergency work of protecting levees requires prompt action and hard work at long hours and under disagreeable conditions, and these colored men do not seem disposed to accept the employment while they have a prospect of being fed free by the Government. The officers say it will be harder in the future to control flood conditions if the practice is started of issuing free food. The officials of the Red Cross say the same thing. These telegrams were read on the floor of Congress this morning. If this resolution passes, the word "provisions" ought to be stricken out and the issuance of provisions be left to the wisdom and responsibility of the local authorities of the State or county.

The Red Cross officials who are on the ground say that in all localities in which inquiries were made the situation is well in hand. But let us assume that these people are homeless. Most of us who live in the Southwest have been through floods and know what the situation is, and let us assume that they are homeless. The Federal Government, then, might reasonably be called upon to furnish tents and cots, because it is a work that can not be performed by these communities. In great cities during a season of flood I have seen the churches, the public halls, and schoolhouses packed with refugees from flooded districts. But there is no necessity for feeding the refugees out of the Federal Treasury. The minute you begin it you will have the same demand added and augmented by political pressure from every locality where any disaster occurs.

It will be irresistible upon the men representing those localities on the floor of this Congress. They will be able to point to the precedent already established, that the Federal Government has extended it in this case and in that case. Torrents of oratory will be turned loose here to the effect that "I voted for that measure," and "I voted for this measure, and now we must vote for the measure under consideration." The same argument will lead to the adoption of a resolution of this kind every time there is a call from the political officials of the district for this kind of aid.

Now, the Federal Government, fortunately, is equipped with Army tents and Army cots, and if we extend aid we ought to extend it in giving shelter to these people; but the local authorities of Arkansas, Kentucky, Missouri, and Mississippi unquestionably are able to take care of the destitution as far as food and supplies are concerned; and if they have the aid that the Federal Government can promptly give, the facilities the Government has at hand and they have not, in the way of shelter and cots, they can certainly, out of the accumulated wealth of those great communities, take care of the urgent needs of the districts. If, on the other hand, they are successful in their request, and Congress can have supplies of rations issued without limit and without investigation, there will be a constant abuse of that kind of power. There is no way to check the abuse of it—absolutely none. The local authorities, feeling that they are expending their own money and accountable to their own taxpayers, may put some restraint on the money they spend for temporary aid in the way of food, but they will put none upon the demand on the Federal Government.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. OGLESBY. Is it not a fact that the passage of this resolution will afford an opportunity to planters all over the South, who have from 30 to 50 or 100 families on their place, to relieve themselves from the burden of feeding these families and shift that burden to the Federal Government?

Mr. BORLAND. I should not be at all surprised. It is open to that abuse as well as to a great many other abuses. If the gentlemen are really sincere and honest, and so profoundly impressed, as they would have us believe, with the helplessness of these communities, they can certainly ask the Federal Government for aid so far as the tents and cots are concerned, but they certainly can respond, out of the depth of that sentiment, by local effort toward the feeding of the people who need relief.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reference has been made here to the fact that some of these gentlemen from sections of the country that are always anxious to dip into the Federal Treasury, whether for charitable purposes or otherwise, that Massachusetts received an appropriation because of the great Salem fire. One gentleman stated the sum as $400,000. The sum was $200,000, but if those gentlemen will investigate, I think they will find that that money was not called for and that Massachusetts took care of that catastrophe herself. [Applause.] And let me also state to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] that if the States and communities which have been inundated by these waters, if the public-spirited citizens of those communities, will open their subscription lists for aid from charitably disposed people, they will find that the people of Massachusetts, in common with the people of New York and Pennsylvania and other communities in that section of the country, will lead the list in opening their purses to aid these communities, as they have in the past.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Did Massachusetts send back that $200,000 that was appropriated?

Mr. WALSH. It was never taken out of the Treasury, and it is there to-day. This Congress simply made an appropriation, and I voice the sentiment here, my personal sentiment, that it was a mistake that Massachusetts, apparently appalled, swept off its feet by the horror of that situation, came to this Federal Government and asked for that appropriation. I think it would have been much better if Massachusetts had been content to handle the situation herself, as she ultimately did. And so I say that until this Congress is shown that the State of Arkansas, through its public officials or by some organized movement, has made some attempt to cope with this situation, we should not be asked to appropriate money, at least, for foods and foodstuffs to feed these stricken people and grant that sort of relief. There may be need for tents and medical supplies, but even the need for them has not been shown this morning by the reading of this promiscuous assortment of telegrams that have been sent, I believe, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] said, with one exception, at Government expense. [Applause.]

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there have been two speeches of five minutes each on this.

The SPEAKER. That is correct, and unless the House grants——

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, just a minute. There was an amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

The SPEAKER. There have been 10 minutes consumed on that. When the rule is strictly considered, which it hardly ever is, there are 5 minutes on each side of an amendment. Now, were both of these speeches on one side?

Mr. MANN. One was made by a gentleman in favor of the amendment, and the other in opposition.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MANN. He can not withdraw it.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. What is the reason he can not withdraw it?

Mr. MANN. Possibly he can do so in the House.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the amendment. The question is on the other amendment, to strike out the word "provisions."

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 76.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LENROOT and Mr. KETTNER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California [Mr. KETTNER] rise?

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, on page 2, line 4, after the word "tributaries," by adding "San Ysidro and Otay Valley, Cal."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "tributaries," insert the words: "And Ysidro and Otay Valleys, San Diego County, Cal."

Mr. BORLAND rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. BORLAND. For the purpose of making a point of order against the amendment.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. BORLAND. The point of order is that it is not included in the rule under which the resolution is considered.

Mr. MANN. It is not germane to the resolution.

Mr. BORLAND. It is not germane to the original resolution to extend the territory to be covered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri that the rule has nothing to do with it, whether it is in order or not; but if he makes a point of order——

Mr. BORLAND. I also make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that it is not germane. An amendment extending it to a different place or locality is not germane.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from California [Mr. KETTNER].

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Speaker, I think the point of order is well taken, but I will ask the House for five minutes to explain our condition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to proceed on the point of order anyhow.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I will withhold the point of order so that the gentleman from California can make a statement if he wishes.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will bear with me for a few moments. On January 19 I received this telegram:

SAN DIEGO, CAL., January 19.

Hon. WILLIAM KETTNER,
House of Representatives, Washington:

Tiajuana floods swept homes of San Ysidro. Must have 50 tents, with full equipment for living purposes, earliest possible moment, to shelter sufferers. Beg you to have War Department rush orders that effect Fort Rosecrans. Don't delay a moment. We shall all be very grateful for prompt and generous action.

WM. E. SMYTHE.

Mr. MANN. What date is that?

Mr. KETTNER. January 19. That is from William E. Smythe. Later I received this telegram:

SAN DIEGO, CAL., January 21, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM KETTNER,
Congress Hall Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

Just returned from San Ysidro. Conditions very bad. About 150 people homeless, needing shelter. Rush War Department, authorizing Fort Rosecrans deliver tents and equipment, as requested by Smythe's Wednesday's telegram to you; also large mess tent and field kitchen, if available. Commander Fort Rosecrans has been awaiting orders all day yesterday. If not received Saturday noon we must buy tents from our own relief funds. We must take care of the people for 30 days or more. Wire answer immediately whether department complies.

ISAAC IRWIN,
Treasurer Relief Committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us see what were the conditions that these people found themselves in. The flood came on them overnight, as it were. All of the roads were washed out. The railroads were washed out. The telephone and telegraph lines were washed out, and I received these messages by wireless. It was impossible for the people to help themselves. Everyone in that community knew that right there in the city the War Department had lots of tents that were not being used, and they thought that I could secure permission to use these tents, to let the families live in them for a time until the railroads could be repaired and they could help themselves.

We did not ask for any provisions, nor would we have asked for the tents if the railroads had not been washed out. I want it distinctly understood that we did not ask for any provisions. We were ready to help ourselves, and it was only in consequence of the conditions that existed that it was impossible for us to get outside aid, as everything was washed out. The railroad is still washed out, and we will not have any communication with the outside world for at least three weeks, except by water. So you can imagine what floods we had.

I have a letter here which I received this morning, which may throw some light on the subject. I read:

SAN DIEGO, CAL., February 1, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM KETTNER,
237 House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR WILLIAM: * * * I will not attempt to write you fully regarding the floods which we have had, as I know you have read the accounts in the daily papers. The section of the country lying in the river beds has been completely wiped out. I can not estimate the amount of loss at this time, but it has been tremendous. I do not know of a bridge in the county that is standing. The report of deaths I believe has been exaggerated, and I think 50 will cover the entire death roll.

The first report was that it was 100. I believe they claim now it was 50. I read further:

The greatest loss of life and property was in the Otay Valley, which is a clean sweep to the bay. The Lakeside and Foster country has suffered considerable damage, and the river is now running a mile wide in that vicinity and has changed its course entirely abandoning the old river bed. News from the San Luis Valley is very meager, although we have heard of three deaths just in back of the old mission and reports indicate a vast amount of damage to the valley lands and improvements. The river has changed its course in many places. The pumping plant belonging to the South Coast Land Co., situated in the valley near Goldbaum's store, was swept away, also all bridges from Oceanside to Pala including the Government bridge at Pala. I am reliably informed by Mr. Westfall that it will be impossible to repair the roads and bridges from Oceanside to Pala so that freight can be hauled over it for at least two months. The road from Perris to Elsinore is completely gone. For the Pala store we are shipping freight to Perris and hauling from there by team to Pala.

Mr. Westfall is the supervisor of the county. I read further:

The relief committee is working night and day raising money and collecting clothing for the immediate help of the sufferers. The people of San Diego will take care of all sufferers without outside assistance. One hundred thousand dollars will probably be raised for this purpose. There should be a relief fund provided at once for the Indians in San Diego and Riverside Counties and placed to the credit of the different Indian agents with as little delay as possible. * * *

FRANK A. SALMONS.

Mr. Speaker, that is all I care to say, but I wanted the House to know that all we asked for was the use of the tents.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield before he sits down?

Mr. KETTNER. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. A few moments ago the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] stated that the city of Salem, Mass., got no part of the $200,000 which was appropriated. The Quartermaster General's Department informs us that they actually got $47,000 and used it for the relief of the people of Salem, Mass. I am glad, again, that I voted for the relief of those people. [Applause.]

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Missouri withhold his point of order?

Mr. BORLAND. I withhold it, if the gentleman from Arkansas wants to make a statement.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I want to answer the insinuations of one or two gentlemen, particularly the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and the answer of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] to the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. OGLESBY] about the planters wanting to get these Government rations down there in order to take care of their tenants and their families. It so happens that neither of them knows anything about the conditions in my State, or the question would not have been asked, nor would the answer have been made as it was.

The gentleman from Missouri also said that it is the political influences down there, the political pressure that is brought by local politicians, that cause us to act here. Now, gentlemen, I want to tell you something about that situation. We do not want a cent of your money for the white people of our country. They can feed themselves. And it so happens that the white people in that country cast all the votes, and therefore when the gentleman from Missouri says it is a political question with us, he shows he is absolutely ignorant, and unfair, too. [Applause.] They—the negroes—do not cast any votes in our country. There is not a man who walks the earth who could look for political advantage through distributing rations to the destitute in my State.

I want to tell you another thing. If you ever lived in that country you would know that the kitchen of anybody who was born and raised there and lives on a plantation is open to every negro on the place as long as there is a bite to eat. You can not fool a negro about that. [Applause.] You folks do not quite understand him. I know of a gentleman who had to sell his plantation last year for less than half what it was worth because he called his help "Mr." and "Mrs.," and then tried to cheat them when they came to a settlement. He could get no labor. We treat our negroes with absolute fairness. [Applause.]

I was born and raised in that country. I never saw a civil suit between a negro and a white man involving a dollar's worth of property in my life where the white man was raised in that country. [Applause.] I did see a gentleman who came down there and pretended to practice law—and, by the way, he came from the State of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri—who got a contract out of a negro woman and pretended to defend her husband, who was prosecuted for some offense. He had a written bill of sale of her sewing machine, and the negro, her husband, whom he pretended to defend, went to the penitentiary. The woman then refused to give up her sewing machine, and the so-called lawyer tried to replevin it, and came into court, and a jury of white men raised in that community turned his claim down so quickly that he never knew he had a lawsuit. They gave the woman her machine. [Laughter.] We deal absolutely fair with those people, and if you go down there and try to win them away from their allegiance you will find out that is the truth. We are asking this relief for them. Talk about giving them tents, when it is 40 miles from where they sit in the trees or on the roofs of houses to the nearest foot of dry land! [Laughter.]

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. The gentleman seemed to be making some reflection on Missouri lawyers. I want to ask him if he did not come from Missouri himself?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, well, I was only 6 weeks old when I got out of Missouri, and I would have left sooner if I had known where I was. I was not a very precocious child. I had the misfortune to be born in Missouri; but before I ever spoke a word I got up and got out of it. [Laughter.] Now, let me just state to you gentlemen who want to open a subscription list for charity in Massachusetts that you do not understand our situation down there.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will you grant me just five minutes more time?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, I think we ought to go ahead with this.

Mr. CARAWAY. Give me two minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended two minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall not object, but if there are any more requests for extensions of time I shall object.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to tell you that nobody on God's earth gives more liberally of his means than our people do. You do not have to open subscription lists so you can get your name published in the paper in order to get relief, either. There is not a home in that country where there is a bite to eat or a bed in which people can sleep where those who are in distress can not come as freely as you can in your own home. I know that to be the fact. I have seen my own town caring for as many refugees from overflowed districts as there were white people living in the town. I never saw anybody go hungry at any time. I have seen them do more than give of their means. The acid test of a man's charity is whether he is willing to open his home and take people within its portals when those people do not move in his exact stratum of society, regardless of race or color. I have seen every home in my town open to refugees, and the tables were never cleared away. There was food day and night. I have seen women who never went into their kitchens on ordinary occasions to cook a meal stand from morning until night handing out cups of coffee and loaves of bread to people of opposite color who had been driven out of their homes by floods. We do not want your charity; we do not ask it; we do not come of that kind of white people, bless your hearts. If you defeat this legislation, the result to some poor, helpless people is going to be death, and if you can escape your moral responsibility for sending some of them down to death by voting against this resolution and justify it in your consciences, bless your hearts, go ahead and do it and we will know what sort of white people you are. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to be heard on the point of order. I do not want to discuss the merits of the proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order, but will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely want to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], who is always fair and wants to do the right thing in all matters, that while the point of order will very probably be sustained by the Chair, as it is, in my opinion, subject to the point of order, that if the facts as presented by the gentleman from California [Mr. KETTNER] are true, and no one doubts the accuracy of his statements, there is a very bad situation presented at San Diego, one that is deserving of our very immediate consideration. He states that they do not desire rations, but merely authority to use the tents and obtain the forces of the Federal Government's organization; and it does not seem to me that it could possibly affect anything to give the authority the gentleman requests to the Secretary of War to loan these tents to this locality. I hope the gentleman, out of the goodness of his heart, will not make the point of order, but will withdraw it so that this amendment can be adopted. Both of these urgent necessities can now very easily be, and I think wisely, taken care of in this one bill.

Mr. BORLAND. I will say in reply to the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a ruling.

Mr. OGLESBY. Before the Speaker rules, I should like to call one matter to his attention.

Mr. MANN. I object to the gentleman reserving the point of order.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from New York desire to say?

Mr. OGLESBY. I should like to call the attention of the Speaker to one phase of this matter as affecting the point of order, and that is that the joint resolution does not relate to the Mississippi River alone, but to its tributaries as well.

The SPEAKER. But the rivers of California are not tributary to the Mississippi.

Mr. OGLESBY. That is true; but I wish to ask whether the inclusion of the word "tributaries" does not put this in that category of cases which apply to a general class, where an amendment adding another proposition is germane?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that. The Chair thinks the Mississippi River and its tributaries constitute a unit—one system. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] insist on his point of order?

Mr. BORLAND. I insist on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LENROOT: Page 1, line 3, after the word "authorized," insert the words "in his discretion."

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, the joint resolution itself, on page 1, lines 6 and 7, contains the words:

As he may deem necessary for the temporary relief of destitute persons.

I submit that that is cared for by the resolution itself.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas) there were—ayes 93, noes 44.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment striking out the preamble.

The question was taken, and the preamble was stricken out.

On motion of Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10484, the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. RAINEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10484, the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman from Minnesota now occupy some of his time?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to compliment the chairman and the gentlemen on the Post Office Committee for the good work they have done in preparing this appropriation bill, and to say that I think our side of the House highly appreciates the fact that they did not put into the bill the provision for doing away with the assistant postmasters, over which we had so much contention one and two years ago. I also want to compliment the new Members on the Post Office Committee on both sides for their diligence and ability in aiding in the preparation of this bill.

This bill carries $320,000,000 in appropriations. It is the largest appropriation bill ever brought into this House, and is the largest that will be brought in during this session. The expenditures were estimated by the department at $316,000,000, but on account of the increased appropriation for the Rural Free Delivery Service the committee raised the appropriation to $320,000,000.

Now, while this bill is before you, it may be instructive to consider the question of postal statistics, and I will try to do so in a fair and unbiased manner, for it is only in that way that we can really benefit from such a labor. The appropriation for the Postal Service in the bill of 1914—that is, for the fiscal year of 1915—carried $313,000,000. The bill reported to the House a year ago, owing to the action of the committee and the Commitee on Rules in encumbering that appropriation bill with legislative matter which brought on such a dispute that it was almost unprecedented, finally failed of passage and died in conference. The result was a good deal of inconvenience and demoralization to the Postal Service, inasmuch as more than 1,200 employees, faithful and true, in the positions of city carriers and clerks of the Railway Mail Service were deprived of their regular promotions, which they otherwise would have obtained. We hope that no similar fate will overtake the appropriation bill this year.

Owing to the fact that we made no appropriations last year, but were compelled to rely on a joint resolution continuing the appropriations of the previous year, it so falls out that these appropriations, which under ordinary circumstances would have become sufficient, were more than was required to pay the expenses of the service. We find here that the Post Office Department states that they have an unexpended balance of $14,000,000, a very creditable showing indeed. But it is not quite so gratifying as might seem at first sight, because of the fact that the Postal Service, which ordinarily ought to be and, when properly managed, is self-sustaining, this year has incurred the staggering deficit of over $11,300,000, the expenditures being $298,550,000 and the receipts being $287,248,165. This brings me to the discussion of a somewhat familiar subject, postal deficits and surpluses.

POSTAL FINANCES.

The Post Office Department reports for the last two or three years have devoted considerable space to the discussion of this subject, but I am bound to state that it has been somewhat of an unsatisfactory nature. Unfortunately the literature we find in departmental reports, especially the Post Office Department under the present administration, seems to be of an extremely partisan and biased character.

Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. To what literature does the gentleman refer?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will refer to it more specifically, and the gentleman will have his fill. We are all liable to more or less bias. That is perfectly natural. But I say without fear of contradiction that reports of the Post Office Department are unfair and colored by political bias to such an extent as to be misleading in the extreme.

To be specific, if the gentleman from Missouri wants an indictment, take the report of two years ago of the Postmaster General about the surplus. You know that in 1911 under the last Republican administration the Postmaster General reported a surplus of $218,000. Upon a transaction of $240,000,000 a surplus of $218,000 is a small infinitesimal fraction of 1 per cent, and is very little, but it happened to be a great and significant fact because three years before when the department was turned over to the Taft administration there was a postal deficit of $17,000,000, the largest deficit in the history of the country, and Postmaster General Hitchcock in these years wiped out the deficit and reported a surplus of $218,000.

The next year, however, 1912, as he states, on account of the presidential campaign with enormous amounts of political franked literature, there was a deficit of more than $2,000,000. When the new administration came in on the 4th day of March, 1913, that fiscal year was in the ninth month, yet the new Postmaster General at the end of that year, when he had been in office only 3 months and 26 days, made a report lauding his administration for the surplus, which he says was four and one-half millions, but really, according to the new method of computation, three and a half millions, and he said it was the first postal surplus since 1883.

This annual report, the first one made by Mr. Burleson and his subordinates, arrived at that result by adopting a new method of stating the balance, somewhat after the manner of the Treasury, which showed an increase of the general balance from $40,000,000 to $128,000,000 overnight. This Postmaster General's report said that the true way of arriving at a surplus or deficit was not to take the audited receipts and expenditures and striking a difference one way or the other, as had been the practice since the foundation of the Government, with one single exception, up to that time, because, he said, there were payments on account of prior years, and that some of the debts incurred during the fiscal year would not be paid till the next. The appropriations are available two years after the year expires. In his elaborate explanation the Postmaster General said that the true way of arriving at a deficit or a surplus was to estimate how many bills would be audited and paid the next year and then exclude those which were paid on account of business of the previous year. After estimating—and you know what an estimate is; it is a guess—he was able to guess that instead of a surplus in 1911 of $218,000 there was a deficit of $720,000. He then said that for 1913 the audited surplus was $4,500,000, but that according to the new method it was $3,800,000, and that the Postal Service was self-supporting for the first time since 1883. The impression sought to be conveyed was that the Wilson administration was entitled to all of the credit for this satisfactory showing.

Any thinking man would upon reflection see that this administration was entitled to little, if any, credit for what was accomplished in the fiscal year 1913. Eight months and 4 days—up to March 4—was under a Republican administration and only 3 months and 26 days was under Democratic rule, while the laws in force were Republican laws. They simply carried out the postal policy of the Republican Party. The Underwood bill was not passed until October 3, four months after the close of the fiscal year, so that if the country was enjoying prosperity, as they say was indicated by the postal receipts, it could not possibly be due to Democratic policies. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I discussed that matter a year ago, and I think I referred to it two years ago. And it seems to me that the officials of the Post Office Department ought to read the debates on the appropriation bill and should have noticed that criticism then. But they are still repeating this unfounded claim of credit for the 1913 surplus. In 1914, they again reported a surplus amounting to $3,500,000, but according to the claim of the railroads they have not paid for the extra weight of the mails due to increase in the weight limit of parcel post, after the last weighing. If this claim is just it is a question whether there was any real surplus for that year. But for the sake of argument let us say that there was a surplus for that year as stated. That is the only one they can claim any credit for. How about 1915? There is a deficit of more than $11,000,000. This wipes out the former surplus, and leaves this administration with a net deficit of $7,800,000.

I will now call attention to another misleading item in these reports. Statistics on postal revenues and expenditures are used for another purpose. They are used as an index to the prosperity or otherwise of the country.

The Third Assistant Postmaster General deals with the subject in his last annual report. He says:

> It is a noteworthy fact that in no other activity, governmental or private, are conditions of prosperity or depression more quickly reflected than in the revenues of the Postal Establishment. Having a close relation to the affairs of all the people, the postal receipts may be used as a thermometer, as it were, to ascertain existing conditions of business, and as a barometer to forecast those to come.

Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly satisfied with that statement. I approve every word of it. It is a maxim in political truth, because in a country like ours a very large part of the business is transacted with the aid of the mail, and therefore the lack of business activity or industrial depression is reflected in the postal receipts. In attempting to explain the deficit of eleven million last year and the falling off of receipts he continues:

> The evidence is conclusive that the postal deficit for the year just closed was caused by the European war. Up to the close of the fiscal year 1914 the postal receipts were satisfactory. The average yearly rate of increase during the fiscal years 1910 to 1914—

Mind you, those were Republican years, and he continues—> inclusive, was 7.21 per cent. For the fiscal year 1914 the increase was 7.99 per cent. For the month of June, 1914, reports received in this bureau from the 50 post offices of the United States having the largest receipts, and at which are collected slightly more than one-half of the postal revenues, showed an increase in receipts at those offices of 7.11 per cent.

> In July, 1914, the first month of the fiscal year just closed, the rumblings which preceded the declaration of war in Europe were plainly heard, and postal receipts declined perceptibly, the percentage of increase at the 50 offices having the largest receipts being only 4.7. In August, coincident with the outbreak of hostilities in Europe and the closing of stock exchanges, the scarcity of money and the general stagnation of business affairs in this country, postal receipts fell sharply, previous increases were lost, and a decrease of 1.2 per cent was shown.

Now, these same rumblings in July, 1914, are mentioned also by the first assistant. On page 7 he mentions the same thing—that the postal receipts fell in July, 1914, because of the rumblings of the European war.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield for a question.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. I would just like to ask the gentleman whether those rumblings had anything to do with the ill treatment of the railway postal clerks and the confused condition of the Rural Free Delivery Service at this time?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will come to that in due course. I am speaking now of the partisan and biased form of departmental reports. The Postmaster General makes this same statement, for on page 5 of his report he says:

> In July, 1914, the first month of the fiscal year 1915, when the rumblings of the approaching European conflict were heard, the percentage of increase of receipts at the 50 largest offices fell to 4.7 per cent,

Now, what was the purpose—what is the purpose—of these arguments? It is to prove that because the postal receipts grew in 1913 and 1914, the fiscal year before the war in Europe, that therefore there was prosperity in the land. For no other purpose did he refer to the fact that the amount of the receipts was a true index of depression or prosperity. That was the purpose, was it not? It could have been no other. That statement is, as I have already said, generally true, but it has an important qualification. The postage rates and rules as to mailable matter must be the same for the periods compared; otherwise there is no foundation for any comparison. Note the deceptiveness of these arguments. Both the postage rate on parcels and the limit of weight had been changed during the fiscal year 1914. Order increasing weight limit from 11 to 20 pounds, August 15, 1913; to 50 pounds, January 1, 1914; and as to books, March 16, 1914. These changes attracted an immense traffic, which the department estimated amounted to 889,675,728 pieces, with postage amounting to $52,859,862. Yet this new kind of business was ignored. To have made a fair comparison the effect of these changes should have been allowed for. Of course the postal receipts increased, but they did not explain that it was due to business that was formerly excluded from the mail and reducing parcel rates so as to attract new business. Oh, no; they studiously avoid that.

The revenue for 1914 was $287,934,565, but of this they estimate that $52,000,000 was parcel-post revenue, and if we deduct this $52,000,000 we have only $235,934,565 left. But postal revenues for 1913 were $266,000,000, so that, excluding parcel-post revenue, the receipts for 1914 were $30,000,000 less than 1913, a decrease of 12 per cent. This would show business depression. You have either got to fish or cut bait. You must either say it is new revenue and exclude it when you compare the two years, or you must admit that you did parcel business for nothing. If you say that you received $52,000,000 from a new class of business, the other classes of postal business must have fallen off about 12 per cent, showing business depression of great acuteness.

Something should be added because of the fact that a part of the parcel post was always mailable, though at a higher rate. The packages that were less than 4 pounds were mailable, but at a higher rate of postage; so there was not very much of it moved. A computation was made by the Hughes Commission as to the different classes of matter that constitute the whole volume of the mail in 1908, based upon actual weighing for six months. And they found, I believe, that the fourth-class matter constituted about 5½ per cent of the total revenue of the mail at that time.

How much of the reported parcel-post revenue is attributable to the old fourth-class matter?

In 1908 fourth-class mail brought in 5.56 per cent of the total revenue. The rates were then 16 cents per pound. That same matter now goes at an estimated rate of 4 cents a pound. It would therefore be a liberal estimate to say that the old fourth-class matter now produces 3 per cent of the total postal revenues.

If we deduct this 3 per cent from the parcel-post revenue, we have the following:

	Total revenue.	3 per cent thereof.	Parcel-post revenue.	New parcel revenue.
1913	$266,600,000	$7,998,000	$39,490,000	$31,492,000
1914	287,900,000	8,637,000	52,859,000	44,222,000
1915	287,250,000	8,617,500	61,559,000	52,941,500

The figures under the heading "New parcel revenue" would represent income upon matter which in 1912 was not mailable, and therefore should be excluded from the comparison between postal revenues for that year and subsequent years. After making these deductions we have the following:

	Revenue for fiscal year.	New parcel revenue.	Revenue less new parcel revenue.	Decrease.
*1912	$246,744,000	.....	$246,744,000	.....
1913	266,619,000	$31,492,000	235,127,000	$11,617,000
1914	287,934,020	44,222,000	243,712,000	3,032,000
1915	287,848,000	52,941,000	234,305,000	12,438,000

*Parcel post did not begin until 1913; hence no deduction for the year 1912.

There is an absolute falling off. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, that is probably all that needs to be said. It seems to me that must be convincing to any reasonable mind. Suppose that the recommendations of the Postmaster General should be adopted? He has a recommendation that we take over all the telegraph and all the telephones in the United States. The receipts of the telegraph and telephone companies of the United States last year were more than the whole postal receipts. Now, suppose that Congress took over these things, then next year the postal receipts, instead of being in the neighborhood of $300,000,000, would be about $700,000,000, then we would have the Postmaster General and his assistants contending that because postal receipts had doubled, this country would be twice as prosperous as it was the year before. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It is plain it can be reduced to an absurdity, and I charge the department with lack of candor and fairness in making this kind of an argument, which is misleading.

"The rumblings of the European war during July, 1914!" Why, I had the honor of being appointed a delegate on the part of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union to a peace conference in Europe to be held August 19, 1914, and I landed in Liverpool the day before the war. Naturally, being about to make a trip, I wanted some money, and I walked into the Bank of England branch in Liverpool with a letter of credit, and I got 100 pounds sterling in gold without any question. I arrived in London and two days later you could not get a dollar in gold for any kind of paper. I had travelers' checks on the White Star Line and went into their own office, but they refused to pay them, and you could not get any money for two weeks. The postmaster general of England had to issue paper money in small denominations because metal money disappeared. The war came unexpectedly to England, that was evident.

Now, what a fortune these gentlemen could have made if they had utilized their knowledge when they heard these "rumblings in July." Why, Col. Sellers's millions, which he was going to make out of eyewater, would be like a kernel of corn to the Capitol building, as compared to the fabulous wealth that these men could have made if they had been able to hear the rumblings of the European war 30 days before it broke out. So much for the "rumblings."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman recall what date it was he left this country for Europe?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; I left, I think, about the 21st day of July.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Up to that time had their been the slightest symptoms in this country of a foreign war?

Mr. STEENERSON. No, indeed. Everything was perfectly lovely. Nobody, either here or where I went, ever supposed such a thing. I do not believe there ever was a more surprised people in the world than the English people were when that war broke out. I saw them there by the thousands marching new recruits upon the streets, a look of sadness on their faces. There was not a cheer. It came like a clap of thunder from a clear sky, and was looked upon as one of the greatest of calamities, as it truly is, that ever happened to the civilized world. They did not know anything about any "rumblings." I am sure of that.

From the appended table of postal receipts by months, of fifty of the largest post offices, from 1910 to 1915, it would appear that the "rumblings of the European War," which the department claims caused the revenues to fall from the normal rate of increase of 7 per cent to 4 per cent in July, 1914, must have been at work much earlier, for we find the rate of increase in January, 1914, only 1 per cent, in February 3 per cent, March 3 per cent. and in May, 1914, only 1 per cent.

The fact is that the value of this "index" to prosperity is greatly lessened by the change in postage rates and rules of mailability. When these are constant its value is restored.

The European war has been the Democratic goat ever since it began, as long as there was depression of business and lack of prosperity, but as soon as our foreign orders for food products, munitions, and other manufactures at good prices brought revival of prosperity, they forgot all about the war and claimed credit for our wonderful foreign trade and favorable balance of trade as due to Democratic policies. When in the fall of 1914 and 1915 war orders began to come in for our grain and food products, munitions, and other manufactured goods at good prices, and our balance of trade began to grow to immense proportions, everyone else knew the cause of the revival of business except the Democrats, but they refused to credit the war with anything. It caused depression before it existed, but after it was in full progress it had no effect on our trade and industries.

That must be their view, for on no other theory can we account for their failure to mention the war in this connection in their numerous reports and official announcements touching the conditions of trade and our foreign and domestic commerce. The American people believe that the hard times of 1914 were due to the Democratic free-trade tariff and blundering fiscal legislation, and that the war has acted as a tariff wall more effectual than the highest duties, and that the foreign demand for foods and munitions has caused the revival, but no Democrat seems willing to admit it.

POSTAL POLICY.

Now, I am going to quit discussing that feature of postal receipts. I am now going to discuss the general policy of the Post Office Department. I have no grievance against that department. As I have said repeatedly, I have always received the fairest treatment, the most courteous attention, and the greatest consideration; and I have repeatedly denied, so far as my knowledge goes, that they treated Members of Congress differently because of political affiliation. I do not believe that they do. I do not find fault with them for partisanship in that sense. I find fault with the management of the Post Office Department in the last three years for a broader and a greater reason. I find fault with the management and policy of that department because it has not been based upon sound business principles. It shows in every way that it is managed by politicians for the purpose of manufacturing campaign material. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is the way it seems to me.

Now, we must remember that the Postal Service was not a governmental function originally. The Postal Service is taken on by the Government because it can do it more economically and better than private enterprise. It was originally performed by private enterprise. It is a business activity. It requires business sense and business judgment, and the minute that you inject partisan politics into the plan or policy that governs that great business institution you spoil it. And you are not playing good politics, either.

Let me give you a little secret of 13 years of service in Congress. I served for many years under Republican rule and had the right to recommend the appointment of a great many postmasters, and sometimes I was weak enough to appoint a political friend, because of political obligations; but I soon learned that that was an egregious blunder. If a man is not appointed postmaster by reason of his fitness and by reason of the satisfactory service he can give to the people—not Republicans, but people of all parties and creeds—then he is a poor postmaster, and the Congressman who is responsible for his appointment suffers.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Did you recommend any Democrats for postmasters in presidential offices?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLACK. How many?

Mr. STEENERSON. One. That is all that I recall. We have only a few Democrats up there. I recall I appointed Mr. Frazee, of Pelican Rapids, in Otter Tail County, and he has served there now for 16 years. I may have appointed other Democrats, but I can not recall any other second or third class offices. I know that quite a number of fourth-class postmasters held over from Cleveland's time and were not disturbed.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Have there been any Republicans appointed up there within the last two or three years? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Not that I have heard of.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will yield to my friend from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. Were there other Democrats qualified for the post offices in your district?

Mr. STEENERSON. That is beyond me. [Laughter.]

I was about to say that the Postal Service is a business activity, and that the experience I had in appointing postmasters showed me that whenever I appointed a politician who was not an efficient postmaster I suffered, because if there is one thing that the people of the United States demand it is a good Postal Service. [Applause.] It must not be tinctured with politics or partisanship.

Now the trouble with this administration has been, not the small partisanship that I have referred to—I acquit them of that, as discriminating between Members of Congress—but in the conception of what the function of the Postal Service is. The function of the Postal Service is to render the people service at the lowest practicable cost and to treat the employees fairly. It is not the object and purpose of the postal department to accumulate a surplus. A surplus is just as objectionable to the real friend of the Postal Service as is a deficit, because the underlying idea is that this service shall be as efficient and cheap as possible and shall be self-sustaining.

When this administration came into power it did not have the right idea, to my notion, of what the Postal Service was and what it was to do, because, according to their official statements and reports, which I commented on a year ago, and I think two years ago, they were engaged in the effort to save money in order to accumulate a large fund—for what? To make up for the general deficit in the Treasury, due to the blundering fiscal legislation of their own party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

They wanted, so to speak, to milk the Postal Service and the poor, humble, hard-working, and faithful employees of a few dollars here and there in order to make up for the deficiencies of the Underwood tariff law. That was not the business of the Post Office Department, and yet we find it in written reports and in the evidence before the Post Office Committee. And that idea is still prevalent.

Why, at the hearings before the committee the other day a gentleman—a Member of this House and a Democrat—came and advocated legislation about the Rural Free Delivery Service so as to restrain the discretion of the department over it and to fix flat salaries and to prevent motorization of routes. He said that as soon as he was elected he came down from Nebraska to Washington and spent three or four weeks with the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General to persuade him that he was doing the people of his district an injustice in rearranging the routes. He contended that their rural service was wrong and it was hurting him politically and inconveniencing the people.

I asked him why he did not go to the Postmaster General with his grievances, and if unsuccessful why did he not go from the Postmaster General to the President? "Oh," he said, "I am a new Member and I was not on to that." I said, "That is the way to correct a mistaken policy." Any President who finds out that the policy that is being pursued by heads of departments is unwise and detrimental to the people will endeavor to correct it. But nobody seems to have had the courage, whether Members of the House or of the Senate, to go to the President with this grievance which they bring before Congress. They are administrative matters and should be corrected by the executive branch and not imposed on Congress.

As I said, it was a policy to save money to put into the General Treasury. The first proposition was to save some twenty or thirty million dollars on the Rural Free Delivery Service. They brought an estimate in here to cut the appropriation for rural carriers about twenty millions.

The estimate was below what was required to pay the rural carriers' salary, and their explanation was that they had put in a clause in the legislative part of the bill that authorized them to let out the rural routes on contract. Some suspected it was an attack on civil service; that it would create 44,000 vacancies to be filled under the spoils system. We may have been mistaken, but we suspected it. But the plan was to save money by deteriorating, if not destroying, the rural service by the substitution of a contract system. Well, the House of Representatives and the Senate, Democrats and Republicans together, put a veto upon that immediately. That ought to have been a warning to the Post Office Department that they were on the wrong track, but they still kept on; they renewed the recommendation before the committee this year in another form—the proposition which they have carried into effect in some of the States, the substitution of motor vehicles for horse-drawn vehicles in the rural service. I do not want to discuss that. I presume there will be many to do so before we get through with this bill. I know the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], whom I see on the floor, discussed it with great ability before the committee.

This idea of saving money in order to get a large surplus influenced their administration and was felt by the railway mail clerks, the clerks in the city post offices, first and second class, and the other departmental employees, because instead of being promoted they were either kept stationary or demoted. A good business man, managing an immense institution like this, would try to encourage the employees, especially those in the lower grades.

Imagine yourself a rural mail carrier, or a city mail carrier, or a railway mail clerk, and that the employer for whom you are working is taking every advantage of you to reduce your pay and make your working conditions as uncomfortable and unfortunate as possible in order to save money, to make up some deficit for which neither you nor the service is responsible. It has a demoralizing effect. The duty of the Postmaster General and of all his subordinates should be to encourage these faithful employees and make them feel that they have a friend instead of an enemy at the head of the department. If they felt that way they would not be coming here to Congress and before the committee at every session appealing for relief.

I have no doubt that the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] or the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE], when the time comes, will explain the treatment of some of the postal employees in New York and Boston. It ought not to be necessary to come here to get that kind of relief. It ought to be obtainable in the executive branch.

So much for the policy of the Post Office Department with regard to the service.

PARCEL POST.

Now I will discuss another feature of the parcel post.

Congress in authorizing the parcel post put this clause in the law:

> The classification of articles mailable, as well as of weight limit, rates of postage, zones, and other conditions of mailability under this act, if the Postmaster General shall find on experience that they or any of them are such as to prevent the shipment of articles desirable, or to permanently render the cost of the service greater than the receipts of revenue therefrom, is hereby authorized, subject to the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission after investigation, to reform from time to time such classification, weight limit, rate, or zone conditions, or either of them, in order—

I want you to mark these words, now—> in order to promote the service to the public or to insure the receipt of revenue from such service adequate to pay the cost thereof.

Adequate to pay the cost thereof. It is the same idea that underlies the whole Postal Service, as I have already explained, that it must be self-sustaining. Some people may think that by advocating a parcel post to carry packages weighing a ton they are doing a service to the common man. But a man who advocates an unsound policy never renders a service to the public. I am a friend of rural service, city service, the railway mail service, and all branches. I want to encourage them all. I want to inspire them with a spirit of ambition and faithfulness, because they have a hard task to perform. But when I impose a new element of service, like the parcel post, I want it based upon sound economic principles. Otherwise it will not be popular in the long run. The people are not asking for a cripple who can not stand on his own feet. They want a parcel post that pays its way.

Does the parcel post as now administered pay? That is the question. I do not believe it does, and I will show you the reason why. The parcel post to-day, according to the departmental figures, constitutes a volume of mail weighing 1,640,000,000 pounds, one-half in weight of all the matter carried in the mails. You remember that in 1908, when the Postmaster General began to agitate against carrying second-class matter in the mails at 1 cent a pound, he stated that it constituted 63 per cent of the total weight and yielded but 5.19 per cent of the revenue. Ever since then the department has been trying to devise some way either to reduce the cost of transportation of newspapers and magazines, which constitute second-class mail matter, or raise the postage. Well, it is pretty hard work to raise the postage. No man ever saw it done. So it must be difficult. But they can economize in the transportation, and they have. They have economized a great deal in the transportation of second-class mail matter, because they send a large part of it by freight, under the blue-tag system. That is, some second-class matter is tagged with a blue tag and it does not go into the railway mail cars, where the rate of railway-mail pay is high, but it goes by freight.

Now, the parcel post constitutes one-half of the total weight of the mails. I am not contending that parcel post ought to bear one-half of the burden of cost of the service. I admit that it does not cost as much to handle the parcel-post matter as it does to handle and transport first-class mail, because the pieces of the latter are so small. I would go further, and admit that it costs less to transport parcels than to transport second-class mail matter, but I do not believe that difference is very great, for the reason that magazines and papers are handled largely in bundles. Newspapers are largely handled in bundles, although there are large numbers which come singly, requiring a good deal of the time of the clerks to handle them.

Now, the parcel-post revenue as estimated by the department was for 1913 $39,490,000, for 1914 $52,000,000, and for 1915 $61,559,000.

Now, the total postal expenditures are in the neighborhood of $300,000,000; and if we get $60,000,000 from the parcel post, then the parcel revenue amounts to 20 per cent, perhaps. It constitutes one-half of the weight of the mail and brings in about one-fifth of the income, according to the department estimates. But I do not believe it brings in anything like sixty or sixty-one million. They say it costs about fifty millions, but it is merely a guess by interested guessers. Why should it cost two hundred and fifty million for one half of the volume of mail when the other half is handled and transported for fifty?

If it costs only one-third as much per pound as the other sixteen hundred million pounds, it would cost $83,000,000, which would be a loss of over thirty millions annually. This is conservative. But why did they abolish the distinctive parcel-post stamp? It would seem as though the law commanded its use in order to know just what the income was, but they abolished it in violation of law. Was it to conceal the amount of revenue derived from the business? They say they made $10,000,000 on parcel post last year. If so, the other mail must have fallen off greatly since 1912.

From the above it appears that, outside of parcel post, the revenues of the department for 1913 were $11,000,000 less than for 1912, for 1914 they were $3,000,000 less than for 1912, and for 1915 they were $12,000,000 less than for 1912. In other words, but for the new business created by the parcel-post law, the postal revenues have absolutely fallen off each and every year as compared with 1912.

If the revenue of the Post Office Department is eleven or twelve millions dollars less, then business must now be poor, because they say that it is an index of business prosperity, or the contrary.

We are confronted with this dilemma: If parcel post is as profitable as they say, then the other mail business must have been unusually unprofitable. In spite of $10,600,000 profit on that class there was a loss of $11,300,000, so loss on the other mail business was $21,900,000—nearly twenty-two million.

I am forced to the belief that the departmental reports are unreliable, and their statistics made with a preconceived purpose to prove that they have made a success of parcel post, when it is not so.

If transportation by rail costs 10 cents per ton-mile, and the average haul is 600 miles, it costs 3 cents for railroad haul alone. Then there is star-route haul; a large part goes by star route into remote regions. That costs ten times as much. Then there is handling—say, 3 cents per pound—and you have a cost of 6 or 7 cents per pound, with receipts of only 4 cents.

If there is a loss of only 1 cent per pound on 1,600,000,000 pounds it amounts to $16,000,000. That would account for the whole postal deficit and leave $4,500,000 surplus, about the same surplus as appeared the year before.

According to the information I have, only 1.7 per cent of the parcel post goes to the rural routes; 98.3 per cent of it is in the cities. So that when gentlemen think this service is largely carried on for the farmer, they are mistaken.

From the tables at end of the speech it will be seen that the receipts fell off month by month long before July, 1914.

Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman obtained that information from the Post Office Department?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; I obtained it from Mr. Koontz, at the suggestion of the Postmaster General, who told me to go to him for the information.

Mr. LLOYD. That is very interesting information.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; and I think I am not mistaken, for I have a memorandum of it, although not over any signature. Now, I want to explain why I believe these estimates of the department are wrong, and also why the estimates of other gentlemen are wrong. It is the same in estimating as it is in the testimony in a lawsuit. The biased witness gives wrong information, wrong testimony, although he may not willfully falsify. In all I have said I hope the gentleman will understand me; I am not charging any department officials or any gentleman that I have referred to with willfully falsifying; but I say that by reason of their bias, preconceived notions, and partisanship they are mistaken in their conclusions.

Take my distinguished friend from Maryland, Mr. LEWIS. A more industrious and intelligent student of social conditions I have never known; but no one can listen to him without seeing that he is intensely interested, and that he regards himself, honestly and sincerely, as the special friend of the common people, as opposed to what he calls the superman. That is creditable to him. He says in the speech he delivered the other day that he believed the parcel post is immensely profitable at the present time. He believes that if we only would take over all of the express business and increase the limit to 150 pounds, I think he said, we would reap a golden harvest in profits of from thirty to forty million dollars. He says that he figures that the revenue per piece is 18 cents over 3 pounds. He never explained why he took pieces of 3 pounds in weight, because the Post Office Department reports the average weight as 1 pound and 11 ounces. Possibly it was upon the theory that he was going to exclude all the matter that formerly was transportable under the old law; but he did not explain it, nor did he explain how we got 18 cents per piece. He did explain that it cost 5 cents per piece for handling. That must be it is for handling the large pieces of 3 pounds and over, because if he means all pieces, then there will be nothing left for general expenses, if you are going to charge 5 cents apiece all-around. There is nothing left. So it must be that he distinguished between the small pieces and the large pieces, but he did not explain. He was particular in emphasizing the conviction that public-service corporations were inefficient, and that the Post Office Department was the best exhibition of efficient Government service and management of a public utility that existed in the world. He said in one place:

> The House to-day realizes its great need for additional revenue. If the Post Office Department will expand the parcel post to its normal dimensions as is done in other countries there is awaiting it a profit of from $30,000,000 to $35,000,000.
> Somebody asked, Does the parcel post pay?—a very proper question. Let us see about that. We have 5 cents, the cost of handling the parcel. Then we have railway pay for 5½ pounds, which costs 6 cents more. You can compute it yourself. The new traffic is costing about 6 cents a ton-mile, or a cent a pound for 333 miles. That is the out-of-pocket expense, for under the sliding scale this is the rate we are paying the railways on parcel traffic.

I asked him during the debate how he arrived at 6 cents per ton-mile for railway mail pay, and he said it was because the parcel post had increased the volume of mail to such an extent that it brought the quantity in most instances to over 48,000 pounds daily average weight. You know under the sliding scale of railway mail pay it is highest for a low quantity until you get up to 48,000 average daily weight. Above that there is no reduction, but he contends that until you reach that point it is 6 cents a mile. I asked the department officials during the hearings and I asked the railroad men that appeared before us, and they said the lowest estimate they got was 7½ cents or 7 cents on the very densest route of mail traffic, and they said the average would be more, but they could not tell. I asked the former Assistant Postmaster General Stewart to look it up, and he said the average railway mail pay per ton-mile was nine and a fraction cents, but that you must add 1 cent and another fraction for railway post office pay. It seems that in the computation my friend from Maryland had overlooked the railway post office car pay, which amounts to a cent a mile a ton. Mr. Chairman, I do not think for a moment that my friend wanted to mislead, but he is a patriotically inclined gentleman. He loves the people and the people love him, or they would not send him here so regularly, and he believes honestly and earnestly that he is rendering a great service as the father, or the putative father, of the parcel post and destroying the traffic of the express companies, although, as we all know, the express companies are now under the regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, so that any interstate rates they charge must be sanctioned as reasonable.

Lately they have had extensive hearings upon the question of whether the express rates were too low, and the express companies have been permitted for reasons shown, evidence produced, to raise them. Yet, in view of the fact that these express companies—and the gentleman does not dispute it—have been doing business at a loss, it is claimed that we can make $30,000,000 by taking over the major part of their business, because it is contended the Government agency is so much more efficient. The only explanation I can give of such contention is that the man is enthusiastic and is carried away by his emotions, like most of these Democrats that we like to listen to with all of their flowery oratory and impulsive speech, such as we had an evidence of this morning. I am glad to see it, for I always enjoy listening to it—and he is led to a conclusion which he desires without sufficient reason to support it. He says here that 25 per cent at least of the revenues of the parcel post is clean profit now. Well, if it is, if we made $15,000,000 clean profit on the new business derived from the parcel post last year, how, may I ask, does it happen that there was a deficit in the post-office receipts of $11,000,000? Business throughout the country must certainly be bad if, after making a clean profit of fifteen or sixteen million dollars on this new line of business, this new activity that the Postal Service has assumed, the other receipts from other mail matter—letters, third class, and everything of that kind—is so small that it dwindles below the postal figures of 1912.

But let us see about the wonderful ability of the Postal Service. I want to sanction every word that has been said by the Postmaster General and his assistants in praise of the employees, the clerks, and the faithful laborers in every field in the Postal Service, but I criticize the management. I will cite an instance:

Up to March 16, 1914, books, including catalogues, were in the third class and carried a postage rate of at least 8 cents per pound. It was 2 cents for each 4 ounces or fraction, which means it was nearer 10 cents on the average. On this date an order was made placing them in the fourth class as parcel post. This gave them a local and first and second zone rate of 5 cents for the first pound and 1 cent for each additional pound. Mail-order houses, like Sears, Roebuck or Montgomery Ward, send out catalogues by the million, each weighing about 5 pounds. When sent by mail the Government received at least 40 cents per catalogue. The Executive order placing books in the fourth class made it possible for these catalogue houses to withdraw them from the mail and ship them by freight to distributing points and then have the Government deliver them to their customers for the local or first or second zones. What is the result? A catalogue that weighs 5 pounds is put in the mail at Baltimore and within a radius of 150 miles is delivered by the United States Government at 5 cents for the first pound and 1 cent for each additional pound, or 9 cents for the 5 pounds, or at a rate of 1.8 cents per pound. Now, if you write to Sears, Roebuck & Co., at Chicago, for a catalogue you will not get that catalogue from Chicago but you will get it from Baltimore. Why? Because they print such an immense quantity of them and they distribute so many of them within 150 miles from Washington, or any other central city, that they can ship them in entire carload lots at a rate of 15 or 20 cents per hundred. They can ship them from Chicago to Baltimore; then for 1.8 cents per pound it is delivered. How much do they save? Formerly they had to put them in the mail if they did not send them by express and pay 40 cents, and they now pay 9 cents. The railroad transportation would be a little over 2 mills, and add that to the 1.8 cents a pound it would be about 10 cents. They have 30 cents left as a clean profit on every catalogue of 5 pounds.

I have been told that there are 40 mail-order houses in the United States that distribute large catalogues and that the postage on those catalogues before they were put in the fourth class amounted to in the neighborhood of $10,000,000; and that after they went into the fourth class, being transported a long distance by rail as freight and distributed to the first and second zones and the locality at 1.8 cents per pound, the Post Office Department lost that much in revenue. It would appear from this that the mail-order houses profited all the way from five to ten million dollars per annum by that transaction.

Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. STEENERSON. I do.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman would not claim that was a total loss to the Government?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; of course, it cost the Government something to transport them in the mail. When I asked the department official, "Why did you do that when you were getting 8 cents a pound? Why did you voluntarily turn around and get less than 2 cents a pound?" He said, "Of course, we save railroad transportation." "Yes," I said, "I know, but the railroad transportation is only on the average 10 cents per ton-mile, which for a thousand miles only amounts to 5 cents." "Well," he said, "We figured that perhaps many of these catalogues had a long haul, because if they were shipped from Chicago to Portland, Oreg., or to San Francisco, there would be 1,600 or 1,800 or 2,000 miles, and the railway transportation would eat up a great deal."

I said, "Well, the revenue fell off." He said, "Yes."

Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman yield in that connection?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. Is it not true that under former administrations it was ascertained, in the apportionment of the cost of the several classes of mail, that the third-class mail, to which catalogues formerly belonged, was carried at a slight loss?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; I think the revised figures show it was not.

Mr. LLOYD. Eight and a fraction cents per pound; and that the Government received 8 cents per pound?

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, those estimates were based on weighings in 1907; and after that the decree, or order, was made which cut railroad pay about 10 per cent, and there were reductions by the law of 1906. The result of the quadrennial weighings under new rule and statutory reductions could not take full effect until 1911 or 1912, so that the estimates referred to would not be applicable in 1914. I do not believe the average haul of catalogues exceeded the average of other classes, say, 620 miles; and at that distance the railways get 3 cents a pound. I am satisfied that there was a profit on the catalogues of about 2 cents a pound, or 10 cents apiece. But if they can make money in sending this matter 150 miles and delivering it at 1.8 cents per pound, it does not seem to me that it is possible that they could lose money when they got 8 cents, because the vast number of catalogues would be delivered within a small radius of the place where they came from; because they are sent to the place where their merchandise is in demand, and their rates are such that Sears, Roebuck & Co. can not compete very successfully up in the wildernesses of Oregon and northern California with the local houses. It is more in the immediate vicinity of 500 or 1,000 miles. There may be exceptional cases, but the bulk of the business is done within perhaps a radius of 600 or 700 miles.

It is said that the mail-order houses capitalized the profits that were derived from the new way and issued stock and sold about ten millions and are paying good dividends on it. I do not know how true it is, but it seems quite probable. I cite this as an instance of the efficiency of the United States as a business man in the transportation business. They say they can make money at 1.8 cents a pound and lose money on 8 cents a pound. That is a wonderful thing. Where do they get the 5 cents per piece that is sometimes claimed it has cost to handle, when they charge only 9 cents? That leaves 1 cent a pound. And, as I indicated to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] a while ago, I believe that, inasmuch as this mail matter constitutes half of the total volume of mail, it ought to bear a larger percentage of the expenses than they attribute to it.

Now, let me suggest something that they could have done. If they said it was so expensive to transport catalogues by rail that there was no profit in 8 cents a pound, as has been intimated, why did they not do the same with catalogues as they did with magazines and ship them by freight? We are shipping magazines under the blue-tag law by first-class freight at the same rate as Sears, Roebuck & Co. are shipping their catalogues. If the Post Office Department had adopted that system, as with magazines, and shipped catalogues by freight and still charged the 8 cents postage, they could have reaped $10,000,000 profit instead of the mail-order houses. It seems to me that the best friend that the Democratic Party possibly can have in the world must be the mail-order houses, because they certainly got a big bonus by the changing of the postage on that kind of matter. If they are not all Democrats, they are ingrates.

RAILWAY MAIL PAY.

I want to say a word about railway mail pay. I have stated repeatedly, and stated last year, that I am not opposed to the space plan. It was recommended by President Taft and Mr. Hitchcock, his Postmaster General. I have never been able to share in the great expectations about the results of that plan expressed by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I so stated a year ago. You remember at that time that the special rule making the railway mail pay law a part of the appropriation bill was also mixed up with another legislative provision affecting the assistant postmasters, rural carriers, and so forth, and when it was brought in here we fought that rule. It went like wildfire among the Members of the majority party that if that provision we had incorporated as a rider on the appropriation bill went in the salaries of their newly appointed postmasters would be reduced and the salaries of the rural carriers would be affected; and they rebelled. And I had the distinguished honor of leading a fight, the first successful fight I ever made on a rule brought in by the Rules Committee; and I defeated it.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], the distinguished chairman of the committee, upbraided his fellow Democrats for voting against that rule, because, he said, they were apparently influenced by the railroads, and he stated that if they could get that law they would save ten or fifteen million dollars a year in railway mail pay. I said at that time I did not think they would save that much, although I was in favor of the bill. I say so yet. And I think the gentleman was unjust to his Democratic colleagues; in fact, it was proven he was unjust, because when the Rules Committee brought in a new rule and kept the railroad provision in but left out the rural carriers' salaries and the postmasters' salaries it was carried easily. That showed that, for political influence, give me the third and second class postmasters and rural carriers throughout the United States every time. The railroads are not in it.

How is it now? I am not opposed, but I do not want to be so uncandid as to promise any great saving from the space plan. I was willing to vote for it because it was supported by the postal officials, who have made a life study of this matter. It was recommended by the Bourne commission, which was composed of three Senators—two Republicans and one Democrat—and three Members of the House, of whom two were Democrats and one a Republican. My distinguished friend from Missouri, Mr. LLOYD, was one of them; Mr. Tuttle, of New Jersey, a former Member of this House, was another; and Mr. WEEKS, of Massachusetts, who was formerly chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, was the other member. They made a unanimous report recommending the space plan. And that is substantially the provision that we have put into this bill.

Now, the chairman of the committee discussed that plan. It is a technical subject. I would like to discuss it, for I just revel in railway mail pay law. It is so complicated that it beats the new puzzle all to pieces.

But I think I can make some parts of it plain by showing you why the railroads are so violently opposed, and their reasons, and why I do not think the benefits from the law are as great as they are claimed to be.

The parcel post is responsible for all this agitation of railway mail pay. Very little was heard of it before, but in view of the fact that 1,600,000 pounds of merchandise is carried through the mail now—and the volume is increasing—it becomes a very important question of transportation. Under the law as it is the pay of the railroad is fixed by weighing to determine the daily average amount carried over the road, and the law says that these weighings shall occur not less frequently than once in four years.

I want to emphasize that. The department has the discretion to weigh every week or every day if they want to, if they have a reason for it; but they must weigh once in four years. The trouble with the railroads seems to be that the parcel post came on in some sections right after a weighing, and this new matter was put in and they carried it four years without getting any pay.

Of course that was wrong. Every person will admit that if you hire a man to carry all your wheat from your farm for four years and then you load on, in addition, an equal quantity of barley and corn he ought to have extra pay, because it is outside of the contract. But of course you could not very well sue the Government, and so they appealed to Congress. The change from 4 to 11 pounds in weight limit was made by Congress, and we passed an act authorizing the department to allow extra pay not exceeding 5 per cent, and we left it to be distributed by the Post Office Department. They distributed most of it, but had some left. They said that the increased volume of business did not require them to distribute it all.

But here afterwards come the Executive orders increasing it to 20 pounds and 50 pounds, and admitting books. That added an immense volume to the local mail. It added especially to the volume of the mail in that part of the country where the railroad transportation was high. Out in the West and some sections of the South there are what are called short-line railroads, that are feeders for the trunk lines. Some of them run into the mountains, where the grades are 4 per cent, where they are required to have double engines climbing the mountains. It is expensive to carry freight there, and the freight rates were high. I think they showed us one road 80 miles long, where the freight rates for the highest class were something like twice or three times as high as the first and second zone parcel-post rates. Well, of course, if a merchant can ship his goods by mail cheaper than he can by freight, he will put them into the post office, and under the law these railroads could not refuse, could not stop carrying the mail. That would destroy the towns along their lines and the country, too. They were loaded up with business in freight cars—cement, lumber, ore, grain, cheese, butter, in large quantities, 48-pound packages. That, of course, took away the freight receipts of the railroads, and gave them no pay for their work for four years, and they complained. That is one of the grievances they presented before the committee.

I say, and I have said to the Post Office Department officials when they came before the committee, that they ought not to bring that kind of a grievance before Congress, because it is a matter of administration and not of legislation. There was authority in the department, where an injustice was done, by reason of an Executive order made by them to reweigh the mail anywhere in the United States, and Mr. Stewart, the former Second Assistant Postmaster General, admitted it, and you will find it in the last page or two of the hearings.

The general law authorized them to reweigh mail, and they ought to have reweighed it when they admitted as mailable matter something that was unmailable before.

If they had done that, I do not think there would have been these complaints on the part of the railroads, and no such agitation. The old law would have done justice if only properly administered. The Government can not afford to be unjust to anyone.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Are those amounts very large?

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, they amount to a good many millions, I think. I have made no computation, but I have no doubt they amount to several millions.

Even if we have no space plan, I see no reason why nonperishable parcels could not be shipped by freight the same as magazines under the blue-tag system.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. STEENERSON. I do.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman think that one of the most important things in the Postal Service is the expediting and delivery of the mails?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly. That is exactly right. Expedition is important. Now, these men that are so ardent of their advocacy of a high-weight limit of parcel-post packages forget that we must look out for the first-class mail, the letter mail, which is the most important of all and pays 65 per cent of the postal receipts. We do not want to load down the mail so as to impede first-class mail and destroy the expedition that we now effect in that line.

Have you ever noticed how soon the business world detects a slight delay in the delivery of first-class mail? A business man from the West, who is stopping up at my hotel, said to me yesterday, "Why is it that there are only three mail deliveries at the hotel now? I heard you were on the Post Office Committee."

Mr. AYRES. Can you expedite the parcel post by carrying it by freight?

Mr. STEENERSON. No. But by separating the first-class mail from the bulky parcels we can expedite that mail. The expeditious transportation in heavy distributing railway post-office cars is costly. And I am coming now to the very crux of the railway mail pay question.

They say that a railway post-office car carries on the average 3½ tons, or 7,000 pounds of mail matter. That car weighs 110,000 pounds; that is, the car weighs sixteen or seventeen times as much as the load it carries. The load of an ordinary freight car weighs as much as the car itself. Economy in transportation consists in getting as heavy a load as you can on a light vehicle.

In 1901, when the Wolcott Commission was investigating railway mail pay, it employed Henry C. Adams, the statistician of the Interstate Commerce Commission, professor of economy in the University of Michigan, one of the ablest men in that line. His report is a classic, and is worth reading at any time. The question was, Are the railroads overpaid for carrying the mail? He said, "That depends upon what load that is carried in these railway post-office cars and the compartment cars." He said that if you could increase the average load to 9,000 or 10,000 pounds, then there was such economy in that that they would be overpaid. If you could increase the average load to 10,000 pounds, you would be justified in cutting down the railway mail pay, according to Mr. Adams. But he says the difficulty then was that they did not have evidence to establish the average load.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Has not the average load increased largely of late?

Mr. STEENERSON. I am coming to that. That is the very thing I am coming to. At that time the employment of storage cars was rare. Since the volume of mail has increased with the development of the country, the trunk lines carry special mail trains, with what they call storage cars, several of them in each train. These cars carry 20,000, 30,000, or 40,000 pounds of mail, like freight cars. All they do is to fill the car with packages. Now, mind you, there may be two or three of them in a special mail train on these heavy routes. The R. P. O., the railway post-office car, weighing over 100,000 pounds, has a lot of space for distribution, for the railway mail clerks, for sorting the mail, and consequently the car carries only 3 or 4 tons. Well, you say that is a heavier car to pull than the freight car or the storage car. A railroad man who was before the Post Office Committee objected to this space plan. I said to him, "If there is economy in it, what objection is there? What difference does it make to the railroad? Is not the tension on the drawbar the same when you pull a storage car with 20,000 pounds, the car itself weighing 80,000 pounds, as there is when you pull a railway post-office car that weighs 95,000 pounds with a load of 5,000 pounds, there being 100,000 pounds to move on the wheels in each case?" He admitted that, but he answered that there ought to be overhead charges. Whatever he meant by that, I am not sure. Now, you see, inasmuch as the cost of doing this business turns upon the load carried in the car, the Government, by proposing the space plan, expects to get the benefit of that economy in transportation. The Post Office Department expects to wait until it gets enough parcels to fill a storage car, and then put that car into the train with a railway car, and then the department will pay 21 cents per mile traveled by that car with its load. There, you see, they will move 20 tons of mail for the same price they move 3 tons of mail in a railway postal car.

First-class mail, which needs expeditious distribution and sorting before it arrives at its destination, will go into railway post-office cars. The parcels are sorted at the station before the car starts, and they will wait until they get a large enough quantity to make a carload. That is the plan, and it is said that that is no injustice to the railroads, because it is just as hard to pull the railway post-office car with 5,000 pounds of load as it is to pull the storage car with 20,000 pounds of load, as both cars with their loads weigh the same, and that the cost is the same in the amount of coal consumed, wear and tear of the track, and so forth. "But," say the railroads, "what we fear is an interference with our freight business. If you carry 42,000 pounds in a freight car for 21 cents a mile, you pay us only a cent per ton-mile." Well, that is correct.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman mean that on the space plan you would be paying 1 cent per ton-mile?

Mr. STEENERSON. It would be paying 21 cents per mile for the car whether it was a railway post-office car or anything else.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Estimating it on the space plan?

Mr. STEENERSON. There is no space about it; the law says that you are to pay 21 cents a mile on any load that you see fit to put in it. It is just like a contract with the ocean mail; we have a steamship leaving New York on which we pay $4 a mile for the mail, and it does not make any difference whether you put on 1,000 pounds or 10,000 pounds. So with these cars we pay by the mile for hauling them and we load them as we please.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. OGLESBY. I understand that for the heavily loaded cars the present bill would reduce the compensation.

Mr. STEENERSON. I hope I have explained that.

Mr. OGLESBY. For the railway post-office cars the compensation would be materially increased, would it not, so that, as a matter of fact, the average would substantially be the same?

Mr. STEENERSON. That would depend on the load; if you had a light load it would be increasing it, but the increased space plan does not lie in that direction. I think the increase in pay comes on the space plan in paying for the terminal service and in the Government paying for carrying the mail to the station within 80 rods and for space in compartment and baggage cars.

The result, you see, is that the railroads contend that if you can carry merchandise freight at 1 cent per ton-mile, they would have a lower rate than the freight rate. They say we will lose the freight traffic, and people will send all the freight they can gather up by mail. That is the argument that they make. They say that it will destroy their freight business and make so much more of a burden upon them that they could not carry it for that money.

The bill appropriates $3,000,000 more for space plan next year than was estimated as required on the weight plan, but it is expected by the department that even at that they will be able to economize. I believe that the present law, if administered properly, and using the blue-tag system more than they do, would largely reduce the present railway mail pay, and they could so economize without any injustice to the railroads.

However, I am not opposed to the change. I am willing to take the opinion of men who have studied this for years and take their judgment upon it.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OGLESBY. In reading the literature of the railroads on the subject, I find they contend that a change from weight to space system will enable the Government to have carried parcel post and other mail matter at a rate much less than they now get for first-class freight. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not any evidence was introduced before the committee to substantiate that claim.

Mr. STEENERSON. If the gentleman had followed me he would see that I answered that. If you carry freight at 1 cent per ton-mile, that is very low. The average for all classes of freight in the United States—coal, cement, and so forth—is 0.73 cent per ton-mile. This makes it 21 cents per mile for a car that may be loaded as much as you please.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman stated the railroad contention. Is it not true that under the space plan there must be paid the full rate of 21 cents a mile from the initial point until the car returns to that initial point; in other words, you must pay the same price for outgoing mail as for the incoming mail?

Mr. STEENERSON. That is correct.

Mr. LLOYD. The incoming car will probably not be loaded to half as much as the outgoing car. For example, mail going west from New York will go in full cars, and the same cars will come back not half loaded, and they get 21 cents per mile for every mile traveled.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is correct.

Mr. BEAKES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman just said a moment ago that the average freight haul for coal, stone, and all kinds was 72 or 73 cents per ton-mile.

Mr. STEENERSON. No, no; 73 mills.

Mr. COX. That is what I thought the gentleman intended to say.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to spend any more time on the railway mail pay question. I want to say a few words in closing as a sort of résumé of this whole argument; and that is, that it has been a great shortcoming in the present administration that they have injected so much partisanship into a business proposition like the Postal Service, and, in fact, I believe that this administration has shown more partisanship than any of their predecessors.

PARTISANSHIP—THE PSYCHOLOGY OF.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. COX. Will not the gentleman be concrete and put in the RECORD where the present Post Office Department has played politics?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman has not discovered it now I am afraid that I will never make it plain to him. Have I not shown that they are making these changes, motorizing the rural routes, proposing to change to the contract system, reducing the pay of the employees for the purpose of raising a surplus because of a general deficit in the Treasury? That was politics.

Mr. COX. In doing that, has it not hit the Democrats as well as the Republicans?

Mr. STEENERSON. I never claimed anything else. I said that the whole policy was unwise. It was and is an egregious blunder.

It has fallen alike on the just and the unjust, but their policy is dictated by an undue desire to be popular and to make a showing, to make campaign material.

Mr. COX. According to the gentleman's own argument, it must make it unpopular.

Mr. STEENERSON. Eventually it will be, because the people will understand.

The gentleman from Nebraska, who appeared before the committee, said Gen. Blakeslee appeared to be "obsessed" with the idea of making money. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] heard him say so—obsessed with the idea of earning a surplus, and would sacrifice the Rural Service to every other branch of the service. This administration is not fairly representative of the people of the United States. Look at the Cabinet. There are three from the State of New York—the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of Commerce. There is one from New Jersey, the Secretary of War; one from North Carolina, the Secretary of the Navy; one from Missouri, the Secretary of Agriculture; two from Texas, the Attorney General and the Postmaster General; one from California, the Secretary of the Interior; and one from Pennsylvania, the Secretary of Labor. Taking them by sections from which they hail, we find that the North is very poorly represented.

But if we take the States or countries in which they were born, then we find as to their nativity that three—Lansing, Redfield, and Garrison—are from the North, five—McAdoo, Daniels, Houston, Burleson, and Gregory—are from the South, Lane is from Canada, and Wilson, the Secretary of Labor, from Scotland. This is the first instance since Carl Schurz, a German-American, was appointed a member of Hayes's Cabinet that naturalized citizens have been so recognized, and undoubtedly they appreciate it most highly.

But the fact remains that, with the President also born and educated in the South, the South is in the saddle, and completely dominates the policies of the whole Government.

Now, I have the greatest admiration for the people of the South. I am not conscious of any prejudice against them. I have many friends from that section; and although my father, at the time of the Civil War, left his home on the frontier, bid good-bye to his wife and nine children, the smallest in its mother's arms, and shouldered his gun and went into the war to fight for the Union, I have no ill will toward anybody from the South. In fact, I sympathize with their difficulties. I know their trials during the days of reconstruction, and they are wrestling now with the race problem, and it has affected them in certain peculiar ways. They are a little different when it comes to politics. They are what they call "born Democrats." They are not easily changed by argument. A Democratic friend of mine, a southern man, was in my office the other day, and I said to him in a good-natured way: "Why is it that the people of the South—take a State, for instance, like Louisiana, where they are intensely interested in a protective-tariff policy, for which the Republican Party has stood, their main product being sugar—why is it that they still, in spite of their economic interests, vote the Democratic ticket?" I said their interest is the other way. Look at Indiana, a doubtful State, sometimes Republican and sometimes Democratic; look at New York; look at Massachusetts, which has just elected our friend McCall, which sometimes has a Democratic governor and sometimes a Republican governor; look at my own State, Minnesota, which elected our beloved Mr. Hammond as governor, who recently died, and which is a Republican State. If they find a good reason, they change from one party to the other. They do not do that in Louisiana and many of the other Southern States, even for a good reason. Now, then, I asked him, "Why is it?" "Why," he said, "my friend, it is fear. They fear negro domination through the Republican Party, and they will not vote for that party if they were to be benefited ever so much economically." They are born Democrats, and that is the reason why they are politically solid throughout the South. No argument could change them. We never hear of Texas going Republican.

Now, then, this solidarity of the South is little understood in the North because when they do understand it to be founded on race difficulties, on the race question, I do not think they will think so harshly of them, and that will explain why you find that the people of many of the Southern States seem to be very anxious for a protective tariff on their own products. Did it ever occur to you that when Mr. UNDERWOOD, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, brought in his report on his bill he referred to two schedules and said that they were the same as the Republican schedules—the tobacco and the liquor schedules? He said that the committee had made no change in those two schedules; that they were the same as the Republican Party because, as he said, they were luxuries. Why, those schedules contain some of the highest protective duties ever written on the statute books. I think leaf tobacco is protected by a tariff of about 700 per cent ad valorem. Did you hear anybody from North Carolina or Maryland, tobacco States, raise any objection to that? Oh, no. Why, if you put those two schedules on a free-trade basis to-morrow Maryland would have half a million people out of employment. And still the gentleman referred to the protective tariff with all the emotion of which he is capable, and called it "the beast."

I recently read a speech by James J. Hill, one of the leading financiers of the United States and a Democrat, in which he criticized the new Reserve Board for the reason "that there was too strong a sprinkling of politics in it."

And I recall the eloquent words of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] in advocating the bill, when he said, "If you enact this law no President who values his place in history will ever dare to manipulate it in the interest of politics."

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? It does not necessarily follow, does it, that because a man says a thing it is so?

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, no; but I quoted good Democratic authority. We have noticed that the reserve bank reports from the different parts of the country, describing the recent prosperity that has come through war orders for ammunition, reads like a Democratic stump speech, and I am afraid that, seeing that the Reserve Board is composed of all Democrats except one, there is a sprinkling of politics in it.

The South has an undue prominence in the make-up of the Cabinet and dominates the whole Government. Those men are not representative of the whole country, and lack the breadth of view that would be there if we had representation from all sections of the country like we had under Roosevelt or Taft. They seem to be influenced by their emotional side rather than their reason. They seem to be spellbinders rather than logicians; and for that reason I think it would be well if we had some good sound business men from other sections, especially in the business branches of the Government, such as the Post Office Department.

The control of the emotions over the opinions of men has been strikingly illustrated since the European war began—one sides with the allies because, perhaps, his mother or his grandfather was born in England; another with Germany because his mother, father, or grandfather perhaps was born in Germany. This domination of opinion by the emotions is said to have been much stronger in years gone by.

I was interested in this question and examined it scientifically from a psychological point of view. Herbert Spencer, in "The Principles of Psychology (New York, 1902, p. 505jj), says:

> That feeling is a large, if not the larger, factor in determining belief, is shown by the fact that, in controversies concerning even matters the most remote from human interests, men will commit themselves to impossibilities of thought, rather than surrender hypotheses on behalf of which their amour propre has been enlisted.

To the same effect see: "Essays on the Formation and Publication of opinions, and on Other Subjects (Samuel Bailey, Philadelphia, 1831, pp. 49, 50, 53, 54), "The Principles of Psychology" (William James, New York, 1890, v. II, p. 309), "The Will to Believe, etc. (William James, New York, 1897, p. 10), "What Should I Believe?" (George Trumbull Ladd, New York, 1915, pp. 54, 55), "The Human Mind" (James Sully, London, 1892, v. 1, pp. 491–492; v. 2, pp. 276–277), "The Psychology of Reasoning" (W. B. Pillsbury, New York, 1910, p. 56). I have here, for instance, a citation from "Wigmore on Evidence." I want to read this because it is illuminating. Prof. Wigmore has written the most monumental work upon the law of evidence that has even been written. He gives a history of every rule of evidence as applied to the trial of causes. He discusses here the rule that was in vogue up to within 75 years ago, of excluding from the witness stand all parties that are interested in an action, even to the smallest amount of pecuniary value. They could not testify. The same thing with regard to parties. Now, this exclusion by reason of interest, he says, had its foundation in the theory that where a man was interested, even to the extent of only a few dollars, he could not tell the truth; that he was moved by his interest, by his emotions, and that he would be utterly unreliable. Now, he says that this rule was abolished in England in 1842, and it was abolished in Michigan about 1846, and in other Northern States, but lingered for a long time in the South. He says:

> It is not easy nowadays to appreciate why these plain objections remain so long without recognition. (1) One reason certainly is found in the much stronger influence, up to the eighteen hundreds, of the emotional element in all human conduct. The belief that a partisan would likely falsify—or, at least, destroy unconsciously—the truth was then much closer than now to the facts of life, because partisanship did then have an influence which has now largely given place to cooler and more rational motives of action. This may be gathered from various features of life in those days. Partisanship then colored the whole existence and committed one to set views and courses of conduct which had no relation to a discriminating choice. Speech and action were more passionate and violent. Witness Burke's speeches against Warren Hastings and the enormous excess of libel actions over their present number, as well as the extremities of abuse which were indulged in between gentlemen; compare the almost incredible vituperation employed against such majestic characters as Washington and Jefferson with the decline of political personalities in the last few decades. Motives then rested more on sentiment. Witness the rise of romanticism in literature and politics; the careers of Byron and Shelley; the vogue of "Paul and Virginia" and "Thaddeus of Warsaw."

Note, too, that these features are still found surviving in the traditions of precisely that portion of our community—the South—where we may see with our own eyes that the emotional element, both in its highest and its lowest forms, predominates in the character. During the eighteen hundreds this predominance was gradually disappearing; the influence of scientific research and of industrial invention and organization made for a more rational and less emotional life. That influence, no doubt, has in part had its degrading effect in strengthening the calculative, sordid, and commercial standards of action; but it has also had the effect of establishing, in general, cool reason as the orthodox test of conduct. Thus, with the diminution of the control of mere emotions and partisanship over conduct and opinion, the rules of law, which were natural enough while that domination existed, ceased gradually to correspond to the facts of life and survived as anachronisms. It became possible to see their fallacies as soon as their moral basis disappeared, but not till then. In short, not before the second half of the eighteen hundreds could it have been fairly expected that public opinion would demand or even support the abolishing of disqualification by interest; nor yet, perhaps, does that abolishing in a few communities (chiefly in the South) correspond to the facts of life and public opinion, as it certainly does in most. (In 1898 Mr. N. J. Hammond, an accomplished and thoughtful member of the bar of Georgia, at one time attorney general, said to the writer that the abolition of parties' incompetency had, in his opinion, been a mistake.)

He refers here especially to the South. There is a footnote, in which he says that the attorney general of Georgia very recently said he regretted the rule had been abolished in that State.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman at that point?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. Does the gentleman intend to conclude his remarks to-night?

Mr. STEENERSON. I am perfectly willing. How much time have I occupied, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAINEY). The gentleman has occupied 2 hours and 40 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think I shall conclude now. I have taken up all the time I ought to take.

President Wilson has shown himself to be an extreme partisan in appointments, and has refused to recognize the Republicans, the opposition party in both House and Senate, despite the law requiring such recognition. It is interesting to compare his course with the magnanimity and patriotism displayed by his predecessors. President Roosevelt even went so far as to appoint a Democrat in the person of Luke Wright to a position in the Cabinet, as Secretary of War, and Mr. Taft appointed Jacob M. Dickinson to the same office. President Roosevelt appointed ex-Senator Blackburn, a Democrat, as Governor of the Canal Zone; Thomas G. Jones, a Democrat, to the Federal Bench; Edwin S. Bragg, a Democrat, consul general at Havana; reappointed Judson Clements to the Interstate Commerce Commission; made James C. McReynolds, now Justice, an Assistant Attorney General; F. Carter Tate, of Georgia, a district attorney. President Taft appointed a great many Democrats, and among some of these were Julian Mack, judge of the commerce court; Marion De Vries, judge of the customs court; Gordon Russell, of Texas, United States district attorney; Mr. Adams, Assistant Secretary of the Interior; Mr. Lloyd S. Bryce, minister to the Netherlands; and Mr. C. G. Lehmann, Solicitor General.

Unquestionably the most important body of men whom President Wilson has been called upon to appoint is the Federal Reserve Board, as it is that instrument of government which should be freest from partisan bias. Contrary to the best judgment of the Democratic framers of the Federal reserve act, although they dared not oppose the omnipotent power the President then enjoyed in Congress, Mr. Wilson insisted that the Secretary of the Treasury (his son-in-law) and the Comptroller of the Currency be made ex officio members of the board, and he then submitted to the Senate the names of the other five members. Every one of his nominees was a Democrat. One of them was so offensive to influential men in the Senate that the President withdrew his name and submitted that of Frederick A. Delano, a Republican, and he was confirmed—one lone Republican among six Democrats.

As a striking contrast to the above, take the Tariff Board appointed by President Taft. It included Prof. Henry C. Emory, a Republican, who was appointed solely for his scientific attainments; Alvin H. Sanders, a Republican, who was chosen because of his familiarity with the production of live stock and wool; James B. Reynolds, a Republican, who had administered the tariff law in the Treasury Department; and Thomas W. Page, of North Carolina, and William M. Howard, of Georgia, both avowed and active Democrats.

Nearly every ambassador and minister has been removed to give place to a Democrat. President Wilson appointed two Democrats and no Republicans to the special commission to consider Mexican mediation at Niagara Falls. The two Democrats appointed were the late Justice Lamar and former Solicitor General Lehmann. When by law he was required to name a nonpartisan Federal Trade Commission he violated the spirit of the act by choosing, in addition to three Democrats—Messrs. Davies, Hurley, and Harris—two Progressives, W. H. Perry, of Washington, and George Rublee, of New Hampshire. Where required to name a member of the opposition party for the Civil Service Commission, Mr. Wilson evaded the law by appointing Hermon E. Craven, of Washington, a Progressive. To this commission of three members President Roosevelt had appointed two Democrats, Gen. John C. Black, of Illinois, and John McIlhenny, of Louisiana, giving the Democratic Party control of the commission. In filling vacancies on the Interstate Commerce Commission Mr. Wilson has appointed Mr. Henry Clay Hall and Mr. Winthrop M. Daniels, both Democrats. President Roosevelt appointed ex-Senator Cockrell and Franklin K. Lane, both Democrats, and Mr. Taft reappointed Charles C. McChord, a Democrat. On the Alaska Boundary Commission President Roosevelt appointed Senator George Turner, of Washington, a Democrat, and later Mr. Taft appointed Mr. Turner on the Canadian Boundary Commission. Mr. Wilson has filled two vacancies on the last-named commission, and has appointed two Democrats, ex-Senator Gardner, of Maine, and ex-Gov. Glenn, of North Carolina. On the Rio Grande commission he has appointed ex-Representative John Wesley Gaines—a purely political appointment. To the Supreme Court President Taft appointed Justice White Chief Justice and Justices Lurton and Lamar, both Democrats. President Wilson has appointed Louis D. Brandeis.

I received a letter yesterday from Mr. Hilles, the chairman of the National Republican Committee, containing other matters, but in it he comments upon the reason why the President has proposed the new tariff commission:

Let us analyze the action of the Democratic administration respecting the tariff board or tariff commission. Is it probable that the fickleness and folly of starving a tariff board in 1913 and creating a tariff commission in 1916 is mere change of front on the President's part? In the light of Mr. Wilson's stubborn refusal to retain or appoint Republicans, isn't it clear that they discontinued the board, and now propose to recreate it, in order to separate Republicans from the service and make way for Democrats? The President's recommendation that the Congress should now create a "nonpartisan" tariff board, and delegate to him the authority to choose the personnel, only serves to emphasize the fact that during the three years of his administration Mr. Wilson has effectually demonstrated that he is too narrow a partisan to be intrusted with the selection of any nonpartisan board or commission, for even where the law has required that he appoint one or more members of the opposite party he has violated its spirit, even while observing its letter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with apologies to the House for detaining it so long, I will close my remarks. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON] is recognized.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, in aid of preparedness and for a more adequate national defense, an increase in the military arm of the Government is advocated.

In the discussions that have arisen some doubt has been expressed as to the power of the Federal Government over the militia under the Constitution, and as to the right of the President to call on the military organizations of the several States for service beyond the borders of the State and of the United States in time of war, and on that question and subject I ask leave to extend my remarks and to print in the RECORD an argument and brief by the military council of the State of Missouri, on the absolute power of Congress, under the Constitution and decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, to provide for the organization, discipline, and control of the National Guard, and for its Federal service within or without the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the brief referred to:

THE POWER OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO ORGANIZE, DISCIPLINE, GOVERN, AND USE THE NATIONAL GUARD UNDER THE CONSTITUTION.

I. THE POWER OF CONGRESS TO PRESCRIBE THE ORGANIZATION, ARMAMENT, AND DISCIPLINE OF THE MILITIA.

Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States reads as follows:

"Congress shall have power to raise and support armies; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress; to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers."

Section 2 of Article II:

"The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States."

Section 10 of Article I:

"No State shall, without the consent of Congress, * * * keep troops * * * in time of peace."

The Constitution contemplates two classes of land forces. One a full-paid force of professional soldiers, commonly denominated the Regular Army, and the other a force consisting of all other able-bodied male citizens, trained or untrained, who could be called upon to defend the country and enforce its laws in any emergency requiring a larger force. This latter force consists of all citizens liable to military duty but who follow peaceful avocations and devote their time to civilian pursuits. This great body, constituting the real physical strength of the country, is termed the militia. The untrained portion of it is called the unorganized militia, and that part of it which is organized is called in the several States the National Guard. It will be noted that the right to organize, arm, equip, and maintain a militia is not one of the reserved rights of the States, but that the organization, armament, discipline, government, and use of such force for national purposes is vested solely in Congress. The power of Congress to organize, arm, and discipline the militia and to govern such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving only to the States the appointment of the officers and the authority of training according to the discipline prescribed by Congress, is so clearly declared in the Constitution that it would seem the meaning of the constitutional words require no explanation. If there be those who have doubts upon the subject, let them read the case of Houston v. Moore (5 Wheat., l. c. 21), in which Mr. Justice Washington, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States, said:

"Congress has power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia; and it is presumable that the framers of the Constitution contemplated a full exercise of all these powers. If Congress had declined to exercise them, it was competent to the State governments to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining their respective militias, in such manner as they might think proper. But Congress has provided for all these subjects, in the way which that body must have supposed the best calculated to promote the general welfare, and to provide for the national defense."

And again, on page 16:

"The manner in which the militia is to be organized, armed, disciplined, and governed is fully prescribed; provisions are made for drafting, detaching, and calling forth the State quotas, when required by the President. The President's orders may be given to the chief executive magistrate of the State, or to any militia officer he may think proper; neglect or refusal to obey orders is declared to be an offense against the laws of the United States and subjects the offender to trial, sentence, and punishment, to be adjudged by a court-martial, to be summoned in the way pointed out by the articles and rules of war; and the mode of proceeding to be observed by these courts is detailed with all necessary perspicuity."

If any doubt could be entertained as to the sweeping powers of Congress under the Constitution to organize and discipline the militia, this decision forever sets such doubts at rest. The power to prescribe the organization means that Congress may not only require the various units to be the same as those of the Regular Army, but it can prescribe the number of officers and men in each unit and their physical and mental qualifications. Congress can require that the physical qualification of officers and men shall be the same as that of the Regular Army; it can provide that all officers of the National Guard shall be examined touching their mental and military qualifications, and the standard may be made the same as that required for commission as officers in the Regular Army. The effect of this would be practically to give the State merely power to nominate, because with power in Congress to fix the standard, this standard must be met. Congress has power to prescribe the system of disciplining the militia. The discipline can by law be made the same as that of the Regular Army, and the States must train the guard in accordance with this system of discipline. A careful reading of this clause of the Constitution and of the construction placed upon it by the Supreme Court in the case of Houston v. Moore (5 Wheat., 1) makes it clear that Congress has unquestioned power to organize the militia according to any system it desires and to discipline it according to any system of discipline it sees proper. And while to the States is left the selection of the officers, this does not, of course, affect the control of Congress over the militia, even in time of peace, nor does it impair its efficiency; certainly not when such officers can be required to meet the standard of efficiency required by the Federal authorities. Senators and Representatives in Congress are lawmakers for a national body and yet their fidelity and efficiency for the national good can hardly be questioned, because they are selected by the States.

Save and except the appointment of officers reserved to the States, but one power remains in the States, and that is to train the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress. What does this mean? It means that while the State shall superintend the actual drill and instruction of the National Guard, such instruction must be according to the discipline prescribed by Congress; that is to say, the method of drill and instruction, and the observance of all things which go to make up military discipline must be according to Federal standards. To use a homely illustration, the case is as though the Federal Government should say to the States: "You must educate your children in certain schools; you may name the teachers, provided such teachers possess the qualifications we prescribe; these teachers may instruct your students, provided they use our textbooks, the course of study we prescribe, the length of hours of recitation we elect, examine them according to our requirements and mete out such punishment for their delinquencies as we designate." It would seem that under these conditions, the school would be rather largely controlled by the Federal head master.

It will be seen that the so-called weakness of the militia system is not the weakness of the system at all; but whatever deficiency exists in organization, personnel or discipline is due wholly to the failures of Congress to exercise its rights and legislate along lines which will give the militia the unquestioned Federal status contemplated by the Constitution, and make it the efficient force which, with proper legislation, it can be made.

The officers of the General Staff of the Army who have appeared before one of the congressional committees recently have criticized the National Guard because the different States have different regulations, systems of selection of officers, etc. This is in part true, but it is true only because Congress has failed to exercise its full power in the premises. As before stated, it possesses the most far-reaching power and authority over the militia, and certainly the National Guard is not to be condemned for not doing the things complained of when Congress has taken no sufficient steps to provide for the exercise of its constitutional powers over the Organized Militia. The Secretary of War speaks of the National Guard of the several States as 48 separate armies. It is true that there are 48 military subdivisions, all comprising the one National Guard, exactly as there might be 48 or any number of subdivisions of any army comprising the entire organization. The effect of these statements is to make it appear that the militia of the various States is entirely dissimilar in armament, equipment, and organization. This is not true; and if it was true, the answer to such statement is that Congress should, by the exercise of the legislative powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, conform these 48 so-called separate armies to the same system of armament, equipment, organization, and discipline. If Congress passes appropriate laws in which it exercises its full rights under the Constitution, the National Guard of the United States can be made an effective force, the different parts of which will articulate with each other and with the general plan: and when this is done, the fact that they happen to be stationed in the territory of the several States would not make them any more separate and distinct armies than are the several divisions of the Regular Army stationed in the different territorial departments of the country. In all these arguments the power of Congress over the militia is entirely lost sight of, and the National Guard is criticized for what Congress and the War Department have failed to do. The Secretary of War complains because some of the States have not organized sufficient auxiliary troops; that is to say, artillery, cavalry, and Signal Corps troops, etc. This complaint is based upon facts, but it should not be lodged against the National Guard, because the remedy lies with Congress; Congress has the right to say, or to vest the Secretary of War with power to say, what States shall organize auxiliary troops and in what proportion such auxiliary troops shall be distributed among the States. Let them do with the various States as was done with Rhode Island. In that case the War Department said to the State of Rhode Island that its militia ought to be coast artillery troops, and all infantry troops of that State were accordingly transformed into coast artillery.

II. THE POWER TO REQUIRE ITS USE FOR FEDERAL PURPOSES.

There being no question, therefore, of the right of Congress to provide for the organization and discipline of the National Guard by suitable laws which will make it a thoroughly efficient force, organized in exact conformity to that of the Regular Establishment, with an enlisted and commissioned personnel meeting Federal requirements, trained according to the system of discipline prescribed by Congress, and constituting, therefore, a reserve army thoroughly organized, equipped, officered, trained, and ready for immediate service, it may be inquired under what circumstances this force is available for national purposes. The words of the Constitution are:

"To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

The primary purpose of maintaining any force is to defend the country against invasion, but in view of the timidity with which some of the opponents of a real citizen soldiery seemingly shrink from the contemplation of the use of the National Guard unless a large hostile army is actually marching through the country, it will be interesting to note the manner in which the Supreme Court of the United States has met and dispelled these fears.

In the case of Martin v. Mott (12 Wheaton, 29) Mr. Justice Story, speaking for the court, said:

"It has not been denied here that the act of 1795 is within the constitutional authority of Congress, or that Congress may not lawfully provide for cases of imminent danger of invasion as well as for cases where an invasion has actually taken place. In our opinion there is no ground for a doubt on this point, even if it had been relied on, for the power to provide for repelling invasions includes the power to provide against the attempt and danger of invasion, as the necessary and proper means to effectuate the object. One of the best means to repel invasion is to provide the requisite force for action before the invader himself has reached the soil.

"The power thus confided by Congress to the President is doubtless of a very high and delicate nature. A free people are naturally jealous of the exercise of military power, and the power to call the militia into actual service is certainly felt to be one of no ordinary magnitude. But it is not a power which can be executed without a correspondent responsibility. If it be a limited power the question arises by whom is the exigency to be judged of and decided. Is the President the sole and exclusive judge whether the exigency has arisen or is it to be considered as an open question, upon which every officer to whom the orders of the President are addressed, may decide for himself, and equally open to be contested by every militiaman who shall refuse to obey the orders of the President? We are all of opinion that the authority to decide whether the exigency has arisen belongs exclusively to the President, and that his decision is conclusive upon all other persons. We think that this construction necessarily results from the nature of the power itself, and from the manifest object contemplated by the act of Congress. * * * If the power of regulating the militia, and of commanding its services in time of insurrection and invasion, are (as it has been emphatically said they are) natural incidents to the duties of superintending the common defense and of watching over the internal peace of the confederacy, these powers must be so construed as to the modes of their exercise as not to defeat the great end in view."

Clearly, then, under the wording of this article of the Constitution and the interpretation of the same placed upon it in the Supreme Court, Congress has power to provide for calling forth the militia for the purposes therein mentioned and to punish its members for failure to respond to the call. There can be no question of the absolute right of Congress to make laws requiring the militia to serve in case of Federal call, and any member of the same failing to respond to such call can be punished in such manner as Congress may provide. It is significant in this connection—that is, calling out the militia—the President need not direct his order to the governor of the State, but can direct it in the first instance to the commanding officer of the militia troops he desires to call for. To quote the language of Judge Wishington in Houston v. Moore (5 Wheaton, l. c. 16), holding valid a statute providing for calling forth the militia:

"Provisions are made for drafting, detaching, and calling forth the State quotas when required by the President. The President's orders may be given to the chief executive magistrate of the State or to any militia officer he may think proper; neglect or refusal to obey orders is declared to be an offense against the laws of the United States, and subjects the offender to trial, sentence, and punishment, to be adjudged by a court-martial, to be summoned in the way pointed out by the articles and rules of war."

This would seem to dispose of the argument that the militia is not a dependable force because its membership would not respond if the President, under the authority vested in him by Congress, ordered them so to do.

But it is argued that the President could not under the Constitution use the National Guard for service in a foreign country in case it was desired not only to repel invasion but to invade foreign territory. The underlying purpose in the program for preparedness should, of course, be the defense of the country from the assaults of a hostile power. Our situation is such that such assaults can only seriously menace us if an invasion is attempted by the hostile power. Indeed, at all of the hearings before the House committee the officers from the General Staff of the Army have pointed out what ought to be done to properly defend against these possible invasions, and so serious have they made the danger to be apprehended from such attacks it is quite apparent our first consideration should be to provide against the same, rather than to organize for purposes of aggression, either on this continent or abroad. In case of war with a foreign country it may be apprehended that if such country is of sufficient size to make it necessary for us to use a large force and the war is to be a serious one, such power would contemplate sending some of its forces in large or small numbers into our territory. In short, certainly a part of its campaign would contemplate an invasion of this country in some form. Let us suppose that the President should mobilize the National Guard on, say, the Mexican or Canadian border; that, having mobilized this force to resist invasion, he concludes that it is the purpose of the enemy to send troops into this country in large or small numbers, and that in his discretion he decides that the invasion can best be repelled by meeting the invaders on their own territory before they reach ours; under such circumstances would it be questioned that he has the right to order the National Guard across the boundary line for this purpose? It would seem there can be but one answer to this question. And the Supreme Court of the United States gave a sufficient answer in the language of Mr. Justice Story, in Martin v. Mott (12 Wheat., l. c. 29), when it said:

"In our opinion, there is no ground for a doubt on the point, even if it had been relied on, for the power to provide for repelling invasions includes the power to provide against the attempt and danger of invasion as the necessary and proper means to effectuate the object. One of the best means to repel invasion is to provide the requisite force for action before the invader himself has reached the soil. * * * We are of the opinion that the authority to decide whether the exigency has arisen belongs exclusively to the President, and that his decision is conclusive upon all other persons. We think that this construction necessarily results from the nature of the power itself and from the manifest object contemplated by the act of Congress. If the power of regulating the militia and commanding its service in time of insurrection and invasion are (as it has been emphatically said they are) natural incidents to the duties of superintending the common defense and of watching over the internal peace of the Confederacy, these powers must be so construed as to modes of their exercise as not to defeat the great end in view."

Again, if the question of the right of the President to order the National Guard outside the bounds of the United States be regarded as other than a purely academic one, under the power to raise and maintain armies Congress can provide for the drafting of any or all of the citizens of the country, and the power to draft carries with it the power to say who shall be drafted. Congress can by legislation provide that when war is imminent the President shall have power to draft into the military service all persons of military age who have passed the physical examination prescribed for officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, who have had military training in the National Guard and who have been armed, equipped, and trained at Federal expense. The power to draft has been specifically upheld by the Supreme Court, and the power of Congress to so draft the National Guard will not be seriously questioned. It is not an objection to the draft of the National Guard in this way to say that they are likewise members of the State militia. It will not be contended for a moment that, if Congress should decide in 1916, as it decided in 1863, to raise troops by conscription, a man of military age and sound of body would be exempt from Federal service because he was a member of the militia. Under conscription there are no exemptions, except those made by the act of Congress.

Finally, the National Guard can be made available for Federal service without the United States, exactly as Volunteers are raised for Federal service. With legislation along the line of the provisions of the pay bill now before Congress, this can be accomplished without resorting to the draft or without further frightening those who seem so fearful that the ghost of the Constitution will rise up to oppose the National Guard, should it be ordered across the boundary, by simply requiring that the officers and men serving with organizations of the National Guard who receive Federal support shall sign an agreement to respond to the call of the President for service without the country when called upon. This contract can have all the force and effect of the contract, verbal or written, entered into between the Volunteers and the Government in 1861 and in 1898. The fact that the officers and men thus enlisted are likewise in the militia does not alter the case in the least. It could hardly be urged that a citizen could not contract to serve the Nation because such service might conflict with some service with the State, and particularly when the State continued him in its service with full knowledge of his obligation to the Federal Government in case of war. No such question was or could be raised when the National Guard of all the States entered the Volunteer service in 1898.

Some who oppose the use of the National Guard as the real bulwark of our reserve military strength profess to hinge their objection upon the ground that the Constitution forbids its effective use for national purposes, basing their views upon an opinion given by Attorney General Wickersham on February 17, 1912. This opinion has been so generally misquoted and its application to the question in hand so grossly misrepresented that it is thought proper to mention it here. The opinion, which will be found in Opinions of Attorneys General, volume 29, page 322, was given by Mr. Wickersham in response to a question from Secretary of War Stimson, which question so answered he quotes in the opinion as follows:

"Whether or not under existing laws the President has the authority to call forth the Organized Militia of the States and send it into a foreign country with the Regular Army as a part of an army of occupation, especially should the United States intervene in the affairs of such country under conditions short of actual warfare?"

This question had reference, of course, to the use of the militia for the purpose of occupying Mexico at a time when the United States was not at war with the people or Government of that country. The opinion holds, in effect, that in the situation suggested in the question of the Secretary of War—that is, where we are at peace with a foreign country—in his judgment, the President would not have the right to send the militia into such country with which we are at peace for the purpose of occupation. It is hardly necessary to say that the question as to whether or not the militia can be ordered into a foreign country with which we are at peace for purposes either of conquest or of policing it, is quite different from the question as to whether or not the militia can be used against a country with which we are at war. In the case suggested by the Secretary of War, should Congress decide to intervene between the Mexican factions in an effort to restore order and we were and continued to be after the announcement of such purpose on friendly terms with both factions, perhaps the proper procedure would be that said to have been contemplated by the War Department, to wit, to mobilize the National Guard on the Mexican boundary and then enlist it as Volunteers under the provisions of the Volunteer bill, it being well known in advance that the National Guard would volunteer to a man for service of this kind. But it is interesting to note that the opinion of the Attorney General does not conflict with the views above given; indeed, the right to send the militia into foreign territory under conditions which would actually exist if Congress decided either to declare war on Mexico or intervene in its affairs, is conceded in this language of the opinion, which will be found on page 324:

"The term 'to repel invasion' may be, in some respects, more elastic in its meaning. Thus, if the militia were called into service of the General Government to repel an invasion, it would not be necessary to discontinue their use at the boundary line, but they might pursue and capture the invading force, even beyond that line, and just as the Regular Army might be used for that purpose. This may well be held to be within the meaning of the term 'to repel invasion.'

"Then, too, if an armed force were assembled upon our border, so near and under circumstances which plainly indicated hostility and an intended invasion, this Government might attack and capture or defeat such forces, using either the Regular Army or the militia for that purpose. This also would be but one of the ways of repelling an invasion."

It is respectfully submitted that a careful reading of the Constitution and the interpretation placed upon the powers it grants to Congress by the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases of Houston v. Moore (5 Wheat.) and Martin v. Mott (12 Wheat.) leaves no room for question as to the absolute power of that body to arganize, arm, discipline, and control the National Guard according to its own standards, and to provide for its use within or without the country under any and all circumstances which will ever require the use of a force to supplement the Regular Establishment. Every argument against the use of the militia as a defensive force is based upon the Wickersham opinion, and yet when this opinion is read it will be found to affirm every proposition herein contended for. The trouble is that those who would know the law did not read the opinion, but took it for granted that the reply to a question predicated upon conditions which we all know as a practical proposition would never exist, answered the question which was in the public mind, whereas such live question was not asked or answered at all. The peculiar phraseology of the question propounded by the Secretary of War calling for an opinion upon an abstract proposition of law, based upon highly improbable, if not an impossible, state of facts, certainly indicated a purpose not altogether compatible with perfect frankness.

The militia system has enabled Switzerland to preserve her neutrality and Australia to send more than a hundred thousand troops to the Dardanelles, the splendid efficiency of which has been commented upon by friend and foe alike. The military system of these countries is identical with that of our militia system, save and except service there is compulsory, while here it is voluntary. Switzerland is composed of a number of Cantons, which are civil subdivisions corresponding to our States. Under the Swiss system each Canton raises and trains its own force and selects the officers therefor. The Cantons furnish the equipment and meet the other expenses of maintenance and are reimbursed therefor by the General Government. The regular army of Switzerland consists of one brigadier general, a small general staff, and a supply department. The Swiss Government prescribes the system of training, but the Canton trains its own troops. The Australian system is the same. Australia is composed of a number of Provinces, corresponding to our States. Each Province raises its own troops and selects the officers thereof. The authority of the general government over the militia of the Provinces is exactly the same as that of Congress over the militia. Australia has no regular army. As stated, in both these countries militia service is compulsory, while here it is voluntary. In Australia military drill and instruction is given in the public schools.

Mr. MOON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate Senate joint resolution 81, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the United States Naval Academy, at Annapolis, Mr. Carlos Hevia y Reyes Gavilán, a citizen of Cuba, which has been returned from the House of Representatives at the request of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. I move that the joint resolution be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to loan, issue, or use such tents, provisions, and supplies pertaining to the Quartermaster's and Medical Departments of the Army from any stores now on hand, as he may deem necessary for the temporary relief of destitute persons in need of the same in the districts overflowed by the recent floods of the Mississippi River and its tributaries under such regulations for the care and return of articles not consumed in the use as he may deem necessary.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAILROAD LANDS IN ARIZONA, NEW MEXICO, OR CALIFORNIA.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask that the water-power bill be temporarily laid aside for the immediate consideration of the bill which I send to the desk. The Secretary of the Interior requests the passage of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. If it will not displace the unfinished business, I shall not object.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask that it be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. NELSON. Temporarily laid aside for the consideration of this bill?

Mr. CURTIS. Only.

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to temporarily laying aside the unfinished business? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Senate bill 3391, a bill to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of Indians occupying railroad lands in Arizona, New Mexico, or California," approved March 4, 1913.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It extends for a period of two years from and after the 4th day of March, 1916, all of the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the relief of Indians occupying railroad lands in Arizona, New Mexico, or California," approved March 4, 1913.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the report in this case be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, that may be done.

The report, submitted by Mr. CURTIS January 27, 1916, is as follows:

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 3391):

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3391) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of Indians occupying railroad lands in Arizona, New Mexico, or California," approved March 4, 1913, after having given the same very careful consideration, reports the same back and recommends that the same do pass without amendment.

The Secretary of the Interior recommends the passage of the bill and suggests the including of more lands in New Mexico and Arizona, but not having had time to consider the effect of the adding of more land, your committee have concluded that it would be best not to do so until further information could be obtained on the question. The letter of the Secretary of the Interior recommending the passage of this bill is hereto attached, marked "Exhibit A."

The act to be extended by the bill reads as follows, to wit:

[Public, No. 438.]

(S. 5674.)

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to request of the present claimant under any railroad land grant a relinquishment or reconveyance of any lands situated within the States of Arizona, New Mexico, or California passing under the grant which are shown to have been occupied for five years or more by an Indian entitled to receive the tract in allotment under existing law but for the grant to the railroad company, and upon the execution and filing of such relinquishment or reconveyance the lands shall thereupon become available for allotment, and the company relinquishing or reconveying shall be entitled to select within a period of three years after the approval of this act and have patented to it other vacant nonmineral, nontimbered, surveyed public lands of equal area and value situated in the same State, as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of the Interior, provided that the total area of land that may be exchanged under the provisions of this act shall not exceed 3,000 acres in Arizona, 16,000 acres in New Mexico, and 5,000 acres in California.

Approved March 4, 1913.

EXHIBIT A.

JANUARY 21, 1916.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have received your letter of January 11, requesting a report on S. 3391, being a bill to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of Indians occupying railroad lands in Arizona and New Mexico or California," which was approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. L., 1007).

The original act provides a means whereby Indians occupying lands within railroad land-grant areas in Arizona, New Mexico, or California, who have resided on a particular tract for five years or more, may receive the said tract as an allotment, if otherwise entitled, upon the execution and filing of a relinquishment by the railroad company. The act further provides that the area to be reconveyed to the United States for allotment purposes shall not exceed 3,000 acres in Arizona, 16,000 acres in New Mexico, and 5,000 acres in California.

Commissioner Sells advises me that many prospective allottees have taken advantage of the act to have confirmed to them the lands that they have been occupying for years, and that at this time more than the area authorized to be taken in New Mexico, namely, 16,000 acres, have been applied for; that for this reason it has been necessary for the General Land Office to suspend action on some applications filed in that State, with the view to their final disallowance unless some of the prior applicants are ascertained not to be entitled to allotment.

The records of the Indian Office show also that the area applied for in Arizona exceeds the authorized area by possibly 2,000 acres. No doubt other applications will be filed or are already filed in the local land offices.

The area provided for in California probably will be sufficient, as there has been difficulty in obtaining the consent of the land-grant road in that State mainly affected by the act to reconvey. I therefore suggest that S. 3391 be amended by a proviso substantially as follows:

"That there may be exchanged under the provisions of the act named herein a total area not exceeding 10,000 acres in Arizona and 25,000 acres in New Mexico."

The proposed extension in time is meritorious and probably will result in taking care of Indians who are entitled to protection and would be otherwise unprovided for. For the reasons given I should like to see the amendment enacted into law, and especially I shall be pleased if the suggested additions could be made, so that there may be nothing in the way of providing for any Indians in New Mexico and Arizona who have, no doubt, occupied particular tracts for many years.

A carbon of this report is inclosed.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE, Secretary.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, United States Senate.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I understand that Senate bill 3331 was temporarily laid aside?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was laid aside by unanimous consent only to take up this one measure, and therefore it is now before the Senate.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Tennessee if he will not consent to have the bill laid aside temporarily to permit the consideration of the calendar, under Rule VIII, of bills to which there is no objection?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object.

Mr. SMOOT. I was asking whether the Senator from Tennessee would object.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But anybody can object. It takes unanimous consent.

Mr. SHIELDS. I prefer to proceed with the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the Senator from Tennessee yielding the floor?

Mr. SHIELDS. I am not. I am asking to proceed with Senate bill 3331, the unfinished business. It will not take a great deal of time for me to finish my remarks on this bill, and I desire to proceed at this time.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

[Mr. SHIELDS resumed and concluded the speech begun by him on the calendar day of Wednesday. The entire speech is printed in the Appendix.]

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to submit some observations on this bill, but I do not wish to delay the bill at all, and I would rather see the bill proceeded with and passed without a speech, if that can be done.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In order that we may proceed in an orderly way, and make some progress with this bill, I suggest that it now be read, section by section, for amendment, and when we reach a section where debate is desired, and amendment is to be offered, that we shall stop there and consider that question, settle it, and go on. I think we would make more progress in that way, and I think it would be much more satisfactory to consider the measure in that way.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to have that procedure adopted. I was only proposing now to use up the time in submitting my observations, on the assumption that there were other Senators who desired to discuss the bill, perhaps, at some later time, and that I might be conserving the time of the Senate by submitting my remarks at this time, but I had a great deal rather do whatever is necessary to speed the progress of the bill than take up any time in discussing it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I like the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. In all reasonable probability, a large number of amendments will be offered to this bill. I myself have some which I desire to submit for the consideration of the Senate. It is just possible, indeed it is not at all unlikely, that after the bill is perfected it will become unnecessary to discuss a great many features; and then, too, I think it would be very much more to the point if the discussion were directed to the amendments as they are proposed from time to time; and I am very sure they will develop whatever differences in principle there may be among us concerning the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Evidently there is no great desire to hear me discuss the bill. So I am perfectly willing to have it read section by section, although I think that has been done, and I think it is open to amendment now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope the Senator from Florida does not suppose for a moment that I or any other Senator would not be delighted to hear him discuss this bill in every respect, and, with that in view, I withdraw my suggestion. My only idea was that if we proceeded as I have suggested when we reached a section where a Senator cared to discuss any of its provisions he could have all the time he might think necessary for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been read and there are committee amendments now pending.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understand the bill has been read, but my proposition was that the bill be read section by section for amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the suggestion is a good one.

Mr. BANKHEAD. However, I withdraw that suggestion.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator, of course, will recognize that I was speaking rather humorously than otherwise, but I think the bill has been read, and, as the Chair suggests, the question now is on the amendments offered by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are certain committee amendments, and it has been the uniform practice of the Senate first to consider committee amendments.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then, I should think we had better proceed with those amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator that I do not believe we would gain anything by reading the bill, because there are Senators who desire to offer amendments who at present are out of the city, and when they return to the Senate—and I think they will be here to-morrow or, in any event, on Monday—they would certainly desire to offer the amendments in which they are interested. If we are going to take up the amendments, I think we ought first to take up the committee amendments, as suggested by the Chair. I can not see why the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] should not now proceed with his remarks on the bill, as I take it for granted that he desires to discuss the principle of the bill, what the bill is for, the object of it, and not to confine himself to any one amendment that may be offered. I believe that the Senator ought to proceed now with what he has to say.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I have withdrawn my suggestion and it is not now before the Senate. The Senator from Florida is at liberty now to proceed to discuss the bill generally or anything pertaining to it or anything outside of it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it is frequently the practice when a bill is taken up to ask unanimous consent to dispense with the formal reading of the bill and simply to read it for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered; but that was not done in this case. The bill has been once read in full, and now in regular order, according to custom, it would be proper to read the bill for the purpose of amendment. The bill is entitled to be taken up section by section for amendment, and to be read for that purpose. Of course I am not saying this to interfere with what the Senator from Florida desires to do. I am a member of the subcommittee on the bill, but for the purpose of expediting its consideration, while I could speak on it in a general way, I have concluded not to say anything except where it is necessary to discuss amendments which may be offered to it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I had understood that several Senators wished to address themselves to the bill, not only upon the merits of particular provisions of the bill but upon the general advantages and necessities of legislation of this character, and it was for that reason that I did not move to have it read section by section for amendment. I do not wish to do so while Senators wish to address the Senate upon the subject of the general merits of the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, it is evident that there will be amendments offered to this bill and that there will be some considerable discussion of it. In view of what has been said I would at this time feel that I was not trespassing and, perhaps, not taking up unnecessarily the time of the Senate if I submitted some general observations with respect to the conditions in the country with regard to the need of legislation of this character. Therefore I want to say that this bill, in my judgment, is a most important measure; that it relates to one of the greatest natural resources of the country and to the means and methods of developing that resource.

Mr. President, the utilization of running water as an industrial force began in very remote times. It is a curious historical fact that the water mill was first invented by King Mithridates, in Cappadocia, about the year 70 B. C. Its use spread rapidly through Italy, and it is doubtless true that the invention was carried by the Romans to Scotland. At any rate, according to Irish tradition, Cormac got his millwright from Scotland about 250 A. D., and it appears the water mill has existed in Ireland from that day to this.

Among the earliest enterprises in this country we find the shoal or the dam and the constructed flume carrying the water to an overshot wheel with gearing attached, revolving stones grinding corn and wheat. Later came the woolen mill, the cotton gin, and other application of the power. Then came improvement on these mills, turbine wheels, and more extended use.

It was not until recent times, however, that the possibilities of this natural resource began to take hold upon our appreciation. We never seemed to grasp the full meaning of the principle, if we had really figured it out, that 1 foot of water falling 9 feet each second gives 1 truck horse power. Knowing that, the next inquiry is, What is that worth in dollars and cents? Generally speaking, we find it is worth $35. This makes it interesting, and we proceed to the next inquiry, Where and how can we find the conditions, ready-made, out of which we can obtain this power? That question is easily answered. We only wonder that men have not long ago rushed to these opportunities even as they hurried to the gold fields.

The conditions are found in a greater or less degree in every State of the Union, but I propose to refer particularly to some right here in the Appalachian chain. They have been here through the centuries, and will be here as long as the sun shines, winds blow, and rain falls. That is the feature especially attractive and valuable about these gifts of nature—they are everlasting. All man has to do is to put them to his service. He is learning to do that with effect, and the more he studies and works to that end the more the field broadens, both in respect to the development of this energy and the uses to which it can be applied.

What is said regarding the Appalachian chain applies and is true as to other portions of the country where water is flowing in any considerable volume from a higher elevation to a lower one. But I shall confine these observations to the region immediately about and to the south of the District of Columbia, because I have some knowledge based on personal investigations regarding the conditions in that section.

The discoveries in connection with electricity, its generation, transmission, and application, have increased many times the availability and value of the water powers.

Horsepower generated by electric power produced by the waters from rivers, creeks, and streams whose sources are found in these mountains, potential in Virginia, Tennessee, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, not to mention other States through which they flow, but with diminished fall, on their way to the Atlantic and the Gulf, will make this Appalachian region the most marvelous manufacturing area on this continent. Here we have the even and abundant rainfall, making the power available every day of the year, because the winters are not cold enough to freeze the waters, and these rivers never go dry.

Direct water power and steam power will eventually give way—that is the tendency—to hydroelectric power. The first is wasteful and localized. Steam power is more costly. Hydroelectric is as economical as steam if the coal costs nothing. By it the power can be transmitted 200 miles with small diminution. Think of transmitting millions of tons of coal on an electric wire hundreds of miles and doing the work of thousands of men that distance from the generating plant!

From Hales Bar, near Chattanooga, from Ocoee River, near Cleveland, this power is now being sent 180 miles into Nashville, and there, as well as in Chattanooga, Knoxville, Cleveland, and other cities, turns the wheels of factories, runs traction lines, and furnishes light and heat as needed.

Recently I saw at Rockwood, Tenn., iron furnaces which had been in continuous operation since 1865. This has no direct bearing on our subject, except in so far as it indicates some of the natural resources of the country. At Knoxville we visited at midnight marbleworks which had been in operation day and night without interruption for 10 years—employing electric power.

In Tennessee there has been enormous development in water power. The United States Census Bureau, according to a census taken in 1908, gives at that time the number of water wheels in operation in the State as 2,160, the distribution and horsepower developed being as follows:

	Wheels.	Horsepower.
Tennessee River	1,691	85,548
Cumberland River	397	8,576
Green River	10	140
Mississippi River	62	793
Total	2,160	95,057

The era of hydroelectric development and of long-distance power transmission, however, did not begin until 1912. According to Bulletin No. 17, by J. A. Switzer, hydroelectric engineer, issued in 1914, seven water wheels, capable of developing 29,200 horsepower, were put into operation in 1912. During 1913 14 more wheels, with a capacity of 63,000 horsepower, were added. Four additional wheels, with a capacity of 16,000 horsepower, were to be installed at Hales Bar, and it is stated that during the year 1914 construction would begin on a plant of 8,000 horsepower on the Little Tennessee. Since that report the Hales Bar project has been completed, and is referred to later.

Mention is made in the report of the project on the Hiawassee River, in Clay County, N. C., being the project of the Carolina-Tennessee Power Co., and which contemplated the building of two plants about 15 miles apart, with a combined rating of 50,000 horsepower, each dam to be 150 feet high and 1,200 feet long and each creating a lake about 15 miles in length. The location is approximately 60 miles south of Knoxville, 65 miles east of Chattanooga, and 100 miles north of Atlanta.

Important power companies, as given by Mr. Switzer, are—

First. The Tennessee Power Co., with an authorized capital of $50,000,000 preferred stock and $20,000,000 common stock, the bond issue to be $50,000,000, and the project owned, according to the report at that time, consisted of the 25,000-horsepower hydroelectric plant on the Ocoee River at Parksville, Tenn., now in operation, the transmission line of this plant by way of Cleveland to Chattanooga, and from Cleveland to Knoxville, and from Cleveland to the Georgia line; the Great Falls site and reservation, at the junction of the Caney Fork and Collins Rivers, near Rock Island, Tenn., capable of development of 80,000 horsepower; two sites on the Ocoee River in addition to the first named, one capable of development of 16,000 horsepower and the other of 30,000 horsepower.

Last May I visited Hales Bar and saw a completed 40-foot dam, which makes navigable the Tennessee River for some 35 miles and produces hydroelectric power of 58,800 horsepower, which is transmitted over 150 miles.

I also saw the development on the Ocoee River, the first dam being 125 feet high, developing 20,000 horsepower. Some 15 miles up the river the power plant is located near the bed of the stream and the water is lifted 250 feet and carried through a flume 14 feet wide and 9 feet deep, a distance of 6 miles along the rocky cliffs, and then shot 250 feet into turbines generating 25,000 horsepower. Further development is taking place up the stream. Electric current is now carried to Nashville, a distance of 180 miles, with very little loss of power in transmission.

The Hales Bar development is located 20 miles below Chattanooga by road, 33 miles as the river winds. The capacity of the dam is 58,800 horsepower. Total length of the dam, including the lock, is 2,500 feet. The lock chamber measures 60 feet wide and 312 feet long. The concrete spillway measures 1,200 feet in length; power house, 350 feet long. The lock gates measure 58 feet in height and are operated by electric motors. Construction was begun in October, 1905, and the completion of the plant was announced November 13, 1913. The dam was built under the supervision of Government engineers by Mr. Anthony N. Brady, of New York, and the company has the use of the power for a term of 99 years. This dam makes navigable the river to and beyond Chattanooga. The lock lets down the boats and they proceed below as they did before the dam was built. The hydroelectric energy generated by the development is transmitted to cities over 150 miles away for service there.

WATAUGA POWER CO.

It appears the first development of the Watauga Power Co. was contemplated in September, 1911, and it was the first large hydroelectric plant to go into operation in Tennessee. It is situated on the Watauga River, about 6 miles from Elizabethton. The dam is of Cyclopean concrete, 50 feet high above low water. The installation is designed to consist of three units, developing 1,600 horsepower each.

THE TENNESSEE EASTERN ELECTRIC CO.

This development was completed in 1914, and consists of a dam and power house on the Nolichucky River 9 miles south of Greenville. The dam is 39 feet high and develops 3,600 horsepower.

The projected developments mentioned in this report are, to wit:

First. The Tennessee Hydroelectric Co., chartered April, 1912, proposes to develop all the power afforded by the Clinch and Powell Rivers, both in Tennessee and Virginia. The plan contemplates the erection of five dams—No. 1, 40 feet high, across the Clinch River, just above the mouth of the Emory River; No. 2, 60 feet high, on the Clinch River, just above the Louisville & Nashville Railroad crossing; No. 3, 150 feet high, on the Clinch River, just above Island Ford; No. 4, 260 feet high, on the Powell River, just above the Southern Railway bridge, in Claiborne County; No. 5, 260 feet high, on the Clinch River, between Claiborne and Grainger Counties. The plan contemplates the expenditure of $20,000,000, and the development will aggregate 400,000 horsepower.

THE ALUMINUM CO. OF AMERICA.

This company has been acquiring title to power rights and riparian privileges on the Little Tennessee River from Franklin, N. C., a distance of 65 miles, to a point 25 miles south of Maryville, Tenn. It has also acquired tributary streams, to wit, the Cheoah, the Tuckaseegee, and the Nanahala Rivers. There is a fall of some 1,200 feet on the Little Tennessee River alone, and the development of power will exceed 400,000 horsepower.

FRENCH BROAD RIVER POWER CO.

This company proposes to develop 30,000 horsepower at a site on the French Broad River, about 5 miles from Knoxville. It contemplates building a dam 70 feet high, causing slack water a distance of 24 miles. The location and plans for the dam must be submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War.

The United States Geological Survey has undertaken to make a water-power survey of the Doe River, in connection with the State geological survey. "Enough has been done to establish the fact that Doe River has good water-power potentialities, and to show that there are many excellent power sites and storage sites of moderate capacity" on that river.

Some big things have been done since this report was published, even within the past two years, and yet this development is just beginning. It means an industrial progress exceeding all expectations.

We are dealing necessarily in a condensed sort of way with the use being made of rivers and streams in the development of hydroelectric power and with its demonstrated possibilities.

This particular resource abounding in the Appalachian region is of inestimable economic value. Its unfolding has begun. Its development and utilization means adding enormous manufacturing enterprises to the agricultural South, and an industrial and commercial advancement beyond our most sanguine calculations.

ALABAMA.

Let us glance at the situation in Alabama next. Alabama is extremely fortunate in the number and extent of her water powers and their location, with reference to transportation by rail and water.

Existing development and possibilities will be found on the Tallapoosa River and tributaries, Coosa River and tributaries, Alabama River and tributaries, Cahaba River and tributaries, Black Warrior River and tributaries, Tombigbee River and tributaries, and the Tennessee River.

In the document entitled "Water Powers of Alabama," and so forth, by Benjamin M. Hall, issued by the Department of the Interior, United States Geological Survey, 1904, it is stated that two large water powers have recently been developed on the Tallapoosa River—one at Tallassee, Ala., and the other 3 miles above Tallassee. Some of the undeveloped water powers were therein mentioned as site No. 3 on the Tallapoosa River, about 10 miles above Tallassee, where a dam 80 feet high was proposed. It is further stated that 31 locks on the Coosa River are capable of furnishing from 1,300 horsepower to 4,500 horsepower each, or an aggregate of 100,000 horsepower. Seven power sites on the Cahaba River are capable of furnishing from 500 to 1,100 horsepower each. The shoals on the Tennessee River are given as—

Elk River, fall 26 feet, minimum horsepower	15,600
Mussel River, fall 85 feet, minimum horsepower	51,000
Little Mussel, fall 23 feet, minimum horsepower	13,800
Colbert, fall 21 feet, minimum horsepower	12,600

On the Tallapoosa River there is a fall of 64 feet, utilized in the first power development above mentioned, and the 40-foot dam used in the second development.

The falls on the Coosa River from Marble Valley to Wetumka is 235 feet in 45 miles; Coosa River from Greensport to Marble Valley, 132 feet in 97 miles; Cahaba River above Centerville, 120 feet in 21 miles; Black Warrior River above Tuscaloosa has a fall of 100 feet in 30 miles; Tennessee River above Waterloo has a fall of 155 feet in 41 miles, 85 feet of which are in a distance of only 14 miles.

The report says further the Black Warrior River falls in the 92 miles from Warriortown to Tuscaloosa 158 feet.

Since this report development has been extraordinary on this river, particularly in the line of hydroelectric power. On the Tennessee River from the head of Mussel Shoals to Bainbridge the fall is 85 feet in 17 miles; from Bainbridge to Florence the fall is 23 feet in 7 miles; from Florence to the head of Colbert Shoals the fall is 3 feet in 11 miles; from the head of Colbert Shoals to Waterloo the fall is 21 feet in 6 miles. The total fall from Browns Ferry to Waterloo is, therefore, 160 feet in a distance of 57 miles. Sixteen miles of the distance, however, has a fall of only 5 feet, leaving a fall of 155 feet in 41 miles that cover the four shoals. The Elk River Shoals has a fall of 26 feet, minimum net power in average years, 30,550; Mussel Shoals has a fall of 85 feet, minimum net power in average years, 99,875; Little Shoals has a fall of 23 feet, minimum net power in average years, 27,025; Colbert Shoals has a fall of 21 feet, minimum net power in average years, 24,675; total fall, 155 feet, minimum net power in average years, 182,125.

The first use of water power in the State—about 1830—was in operating small sawmills. Followed the use in operating cotton gins, cotton mills, gristmills, ice factories, and various enterprises, until we have the enormous power plant of to-day generating thousands of horsepower and transmitting electric energy hundreds of miles to do the work of hundreds of men and thousands of tons of coal, in operating car lines, furnishing lights for cities and towns, the turning of the wheels of factories, in near and distant communities. The utilization of these water powers makes possible the generation of electric energy, which can be transmitted and applied many miles away, at a cost less than the same amount of power could be produced by the use of fuel of any kind or the best coal—for instance, if the coal were taken from the ground and placed alongside the mine, free of cost.

Ninety-eight years ago the improvement of the Warrior River was begun. May 13, 1915, the dam at Lock 17 under the new project was completed, being 63 feet high, giving slack-water navigation above the dam for 100 miles, the main lake being 67 miles long, completing a waterway 450 miles in length, and developing at the same time a water power that will make itself felt as a constructive agency far beyond the State. This improvement has cost $12,000,000, and makes one of the largest canalized rivers in the world, running for 100 miles through the greatest coal deposit in the South, giving the cheapest form of transportation to the Gulf.

Coal can now be carried from mines above Lock 17 to Mobile for less than 50 cents a ton, whereas the rate by rail is $1.10. The completion of the inland waterway along the Gulf will give similar favorable rates to Pensacola, New Orleans, and other points, and from thence by ocean carriers to the markets of the world the steel, iron pipe, and other products of the Birmingham district will go. It is only 15 miles from Birmingham to this river, and high-class freight is now moving by water from New York to Maxine and thence by motor trucks to Birmingham. From Cordova, on this river, the Indian Head Cotton Mill is planning to ship its products to China by all-water route, the saving in freight rates amounting to a good profit on the business.

The proposed development at Muscle Shoals, on the Tennessee, will, when completed, give similar practical results of far-reaching importance, both with respect to navigation and the creation of hydroelectric energy.

One of the most important uses to which this power will be put is the taking of nitrogen from the air, fixing it in lime, and utilizing it in the manufacture of commercial fertilizers. Again, it will free us from dependence on Chile for nitrates, because it will enable us literally to extract saltpeter from the air. The electric spark has aroused the country, and, as in Germany, why should it not touch the blackness of anthracite, which we have in abundance, and bring forth the magic colors of aniline dyes?

GEORGIA.

A number of rivers in Georgia afford valuable water-power opportunities. Some of them have been highly developed, and the effect is shown in growing manufacturing and in various lines of industrial activity. Perhaps the Flint, Chattahoochee, Savannah, Ockmulgee, and Tallulah Rivers show the greatest power operations, but the Coosa, Etowah, Oconee, Altamha, Broad, Satilla, Ogeechee, Tallapoosa, Toccoa, and others, besides numerous streams designated as creeks, furnish conditions most favorable to the creation of power of vast commercial value.

The first successful cotton mill in the State was erected at Whitehall, near Athens, in 1828. There are now 145 with capital of $36,982,845. The first cotton factory was built on Upton Creek, near Washington, in 1811. The active cotton spindles in the United States in 1839 were 2,284,631. In 1913 there were 32,107,572. In the cotton-growing States they have increased from 180,927 in 1839 to 12,711,303 in 1913. The cotton gin did not appear until 1793. Our export of cotton that year was 975 bales, and Liverpool questioned that such an amount of cotton could be produced in this country. Now, it takes our best to hold the production down to 12,000,000 bales. Georgia also has woolen mills, knitting mills, silk mills, about one-fourth of which use water power, about one-half steam, and one-fourth electricity.

There are 53 electric-power plants in the State, with a capital and surplus of $39,066,086. She has 187 cotton oil mills with a capital and surplus of $14,120,000; 302 fertilizer factories, the value of the manufactured product of which amounted to $34,083,230 in 1914.

The development of hydroelectric power is in its early stages. Its growth from now on will be rapid and extensive. Manufacturing will increase in all directions, and industrial advancement will proceed with quickened pace.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. Frank S. Washburn, in an excellent article read before the Southern Commercial Congress, says:

Even this striking superiority in rainfall does not directly convey an adequate idea of the superiority of southern water-power possibilities, for it is the volume of water which actually finds its way into the streams that determines the measure of power, and this may be less than 2 per cent of the precipitation in a region of 20 inches average rainfall, and may exceed 50 per cent of the precipitation in a region of 65 inches average rainfall. A realization of these exceptional meteorological phenomena, coupled with the unparalleled surface conditions comprised in the towering mountain masses of the southern Appalachian, covered with close-set hardwood forests, nurtured in their birthplace, impels the mind to the belief that here is the spot nature selected to foster man's efforts to transform to his uses the exhaustless energy of falling water.

In "Water Powers of South Carolina," by August Kohn, a very instructive series of articles, the author says:

Fifty-five years ago William Gregg, then battling and urging South Carolina to recognize and encourage cotton mills, made these observations in the Charleston Courier: "The cheapness of water power, if not the chief, will at least constitute one important element of success with us. There is probably no State in the Union in which water power is more abundant. Leaving out the question, as being too tedious to enumerate, the great waterfalls on the tributary streams of the Pee Dee, Wateree, Broad, and Saluda Rivers, we will notice these only, in the immediate vicinity of our two lines of railroads to Columbia and Hamburg, that is within 5 miles of them. In the most healthy regions of the State, abounding with granite and building timber, water power may be found sufficient to work up half the crop of South Carolina, all of which is nearly valueless at the present time.

"God speed on the glorious result that may be anticipated from so great a change in our industrial pursuits."

"Were all our hopes in this particular consummated, South Carolina would present a delightful picture. Every son and every daughter would find healthful and lucrative employment; our roads, which are now a disgrace to us, would be improved; we would no longer be under the necessity of sending to the North for half-made wagons and carriages to break our necks; we would have, if not as handsome, at least as honestly and faithfully made ones, and mechanics always at hand to repair them. Workshops would take the place of the throngs of clothing, hat, and shoe stores, and the watchword would be from the seaboard to the mountains, 'Success to domestic industry.'"

Such was the prophecy and logic of William Gregg, the founder of the Graniteville Mills, and the one man above all others to whom is due the credit of the successful cotton-mill industry of South Carolina.

The State built the Columbia Canal and invested $198,788 in the Rocky Mount Canal, on the Catawba River. The largest water powers are to-day in the sites of these canals. The very shoals in the rivers which were such an obstruction to navigation are to-day the basis of wealth-producing water-power development, which individual effort, independent of any State aid, is accomplishing on a splendid scale.

From the sixth annual report of the commission of agriculture, commercial industries (1914), we find it set forth that the textile industry of the State continues to be several times the leading of all manufacturing industries of South Carolina. Of the $161,899,384 invested in manufacturing plants, the sum of $86,970,075 is represented by the textiles. The next largest investment of capital is in plants generating electricity, if this can be classified as a principal industry, the amount involved being very nearly $20,000,000. Of the industries proper, lumber, as usual, ranks second, with over $18,000,000 capital. Standing in third place is the fertilizer-manufacturing industry, with $13,610,440 net capital, and then comes the oil-mill industry, with $4,032,207 in capital. From the standpoint of product the textile industry leads all of the industries of the State, the oil mills coming second with $15,347,711. The fertilizer industry third, with $11,116,500, and lumber and timber coming fourth, with $10,164,566.

TURNING MORE TO ELECTRIC POWER.

As in recent years, there is a further decrease this year of horsepower derived from direct water power, the decrease being 1,379 horsepower. The steam power has decreased during the year by 3,495 horsepower. On the other hand, there has been an increase of horsepower generated by electric power from water of 1,656 horsepower, and of electric horsepower generated by steam of 6,145 horsepower.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Manufacturing in North Carolina is indicated by the following from the State report:

The total number of miscellaneous factories reporting to the department for the year ending June 30, 1914, is 755.

power. The approximate amount of raw material used was 1,860,000 pounds; estimated value of yearly output reported, $755,000.

The approximate amount of raw material used was 242,000 pounds; estimated value of yearly output, $678,750. The total number of employees reported by three mills was 842.

CORDAGE MILLS.

The four cordage mills reporting showed a capital stock of $460,000. The number of spindles reported was 15,936; braiders, 250; cards, 52; employing 735 horsepower. The approximate amount of raw material used was 3,295,466 pounds; estimated value of yearly output, $1,211,467.

KNITTING MILLS.

Seventy-eight knitting mills are reported for 1914. Fifty-six of these showed capital stock of $4,762,196. The approximate amount of raw material used by 47 mills was 16,879,172 pounds. The estimated value of yearly output by 49 mills was $7,771,080.45. The number of spindles in use in these mills was given as 144,840; knitting machines, 10,760; sewing machines, 1,000; cards, 572—making use of 20,163 horsepower. Thirteen do not report horsepower.

Twenty-eight mills use steam for power, 36 use electricity, 2 gasoline, 2 steam and electricity, 2 water, 1 steam and water, 2 kerosene, 4 do not report power used.

FURNITURE FACTORIES.

The number of furniture factories reporting in 1914 was 84. Eighty-one of these reported capital stock of $3,327,205. Seventy-nine of them report the use of 10,078 horsepower.

Seventy-two factories use steam for power, 5 electric, 3 hand, 1 steam and electric, 1 steam and water. Estimated value of plants by 74 factories, $2,822,000. Estimated value of yearly output by all factories, $12,640,000; estimated yearly pay roll, $1,988,650.

The Southern Power Co., of North Carolina, has ten million invested in hydroelectric plants and is now building one of these to furnish 30,000 horsepower.

OTHER STATES.

Virginia has 12 cotton mills, with capital of $13,108,715.

Lumber mills in Mississippi and Florida operated by electricity, traction lines in West Virginia and elsewhere, shipbuilding at Sparrows Point, Newport News, Jacksonville, Pensacola, Mobile, and other southern yards, requiring electricity, show marked expansion and development, details of which might be cited to the point of weariness. But the water powers in these Southern States constitute an asset so valuable we can scarcely estimate or comprehend it. Their wise use will turn to account a resource of incalculable value, as permanent as the mountains, as inexhaustible as the rivers.

Large capital is required for the development and transmission of hydroelectric energy on a scale which natural conditions and industrial demands call for, and legislation such as contemplated in the pending bill will open the way and give opportunity for its profitable employment, thus utilizing for the service of man the forces now dormant or wasted. Released, these agencies will make for permanent growth and progress unlimited.

One other suggestion. We import annually more than $50,000,000 worth of materials for fertilizers and explosives, all of which could be produced in this country by proper development of our water power. About 70 per cent of our water powers are lying idle, and only about 30 per cent have been developed. Our undeveloped horsepower is estimated at 60,000,000.

Suppose we could profitably develop, under present conditions, only 15,000,000 horsepower. That would mean, if fully utilized, the conservation of 100,000,000 tons of coal per annum, it is claimed, estimated at this time to be worth $225,000,000 annually, in the boiler furnace, and the conservation of the labor of about 280,000 miners and operatives annually for other safer and better uses. This would buy, it is estimated, 2,250,000 acres of land. It would also mean the establishment of new industries, such as the manufacture of fertilizers, nitric acid for explosives, many electrochemical products, high-grade steel, and other industries requiring cheaper power than can now be obtained.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], who has been called from the Chamber, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m., Friday, February 11, 1916) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, February 12, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 11, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Father Soul, infinite in wisdom, power, and goodness, "who will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth," illumine our minds and help us to crystallize our thoughts into deeds of worthiness, assured if we live to our highest conceptions of truth to-day we shall be better prepared to live to-morrow; that if we live to our highest ideals in this life the next life will take care of itself. So inspire, encourage, and guide us to do Thy will now and evermore. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PEACE.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for six minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for six minutes.

Mr. MANN. About what?

Mr. BARNHART. I want to have a resolution read by the Clerk relative to peace and to make a few brief remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object. The gentleman can come in on general debate.

LINDLEY M. GARRISON.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by having printed therein copies of the letters exchanged between the President of the United States and Secretary of War Garrison, leading up to the latter's resignation from the Cabinet.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] asks unanimous consent to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD copies of the correspondence between the President of the United States and Secretary of War Garrison leading up to his resignation. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in favor of permitting this to go in?

Mr. MANN. I am in favor of always showing the division that constantly exists on the Democratic side within the Democratic Party.

Mr. BARNHART. Then I object.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Then the gentleman admits that is what this shows.

The SPEAKER. Remarks are out of order.

INDIAN AGENTS.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating therein a memorial from citizens of Minnesota and a letter from a citizen of Minnesota in reference to the improper operation of Indian officers in that section of the country.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the remarks to which he refers. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does this consist of some charges against some public officials?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. It is in continuation of remarks which I made in the RECORD upon the subject a few days ago touching very aggravating and, I think, irritating actions on the part of public officers acting in that country. Let me say for the information of the gentleman—and I will not extend my remarks beyond the sentence—here is a petition signed by practically every business, professional, and other citizen of Brainerd, Minn., a town of about 15,000 inhabitants, protesting against these illegal actions, and I want to submit it in the RECORD in connection with what I have heretofore said upon the subject.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It ought to be sent to the committee.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I think I can present it in another form that will not be objectionable.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does the gentleman understand that I want to extend my remarks on the Post Office appropriation bill which I made on yesterday?

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, I withdraw that objection. The gentleman did not say that he wanted to revise his remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Speaker, to-morrow is the anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln. I ask unanimous consent that upon the conclusion of the remarks of my colleague, Mr. WHEELER, I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes on the life and character of that great American.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of Mr. WHEELER, of Illinois, to-morrow he have 20 minutes in which to address the House on the life and character of Abraham Lincoln. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, and pending that motion I desire to arrange, if possible, the limit of general debate upon the first bill to be called up. So far as I know now, I think an hour and twenty minutes of general debate is all that has been asked for, and I desire to have that request included in the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, and pending the motion asks unanimous consent that general debate be restricted to 1 hour and 20 minutes, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by—whom?

Mr. BURKE. By the ranking Republican Member of the committee.

The SPEAKER. By the ranking Republican on the committee. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the bill?

Mr. BURKE. An omnibus pension bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What is the request?

The SPEAKER. That general debate be limited to an hour and twenty minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Debate of an hour and twenty minutes on what?

The SPEAKER. On anything that comes up under the pension bill.

Mr. MANN. There are three pension bills, and the motion was to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Which one of these bills does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE] suggest that the hour and twenty minutes' debate be had on?

Mr. BURKE. On the first bill to be called up—H. R. 11078.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

RESIGNATION FROM A COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignation:

The Clerk read as follows:

FEBRUARY 11, 1916.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department on account of having been appointed upon the Committee on Flood Control.

Respectfully, JOE J. RUSSELL.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON FLOOD CONTROL.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 133 (H. Rept. 165).

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Flood Control be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a clerk for said committee at an annual salary of $2,500 and a messenger to said committee at an annual salary of $1,000, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman if other messengers receive $1,000.

Mr. LLOYD. Some receive $720, some receive $1,000, and it depends largely upon the work that is intended to be done by the messenger. In this instance we were assured by the chairman of the Committee on Flood Control that he wants the messenger also to perform duty as stenographer. You could not expect a stenographer to perform that duty at $60 a month.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why does not the Committee on Accounts give him a stenographer, what you intend to give him?

Mr. LLOYD. Well, he performs both duties.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. I will.

Mr. MANN. What is the salary provided for the clerk?

Mr. LLOYD. $2,500.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that is the usual salary for clerks to committees of this class?

Mr. LLOYD. Some committees have clerks at $2,500 and some have them at $2,000. I would suppose this committee was one of those committees that is entitled to a clerk at a salary of $2,500. If it is going to investigate the floods and drainage of the country, it will require a good deal of work and will also require expert work, and I would suppose the salary was all right.

Mr. MANN. The Immigration Committee has a clerk at $2,000, and it does twice as much work as this committee ever will do; it has a janitor at $720. The Committee on Insular Affairs has a clerk at $2,000, and that committee does twice as much work as this committee will do, and it has a janitor at $720. The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries has a clerk at $2,000 and a janitor at $720, and does five times as much work as this committee will ever do. I might go through the list of the other committees in the same way. The Committee on Territories has a clerk at $2,000 and a janitor at $720, and they have a great deal of work to do. The Committee on Public Lands, which does ten times as much work as this committee will ever do, has a clerk at $2,000 and a janitor at $720. Now, if you are going to give all the committee clerks $2,500, very well; vote for it; and if you are going to give all the janitors $1,000, vote for it; but when you appoint a committee of the House to take the place of the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River and propose to give it employees at much higher salaries than the real working committees of the House, it seems to me that means that you have got to increase the others. The gentleman says this messenger is to be a stenographer. We have committee stenographers to whom we pay considerable salaries.

Mr. FITZGERALD. $5,000.

Mr. MANN. And no committee has any need of a special stenographer, and to employ a janitor who is a stenographer and say it is for a stenographer will be to inaugurate a policy here to give each committee a stenographer, which means an additional employee to each committee of the House. Now, if the gentleman wants to take the responsibility of doing that, do it on the square.

Mr. LLOYD. If we provided for a stenographer, then the other committees might ask for a stenographer, but if we provide for a messenger to the chairman of the committee, and if the chairman of the committee requires this individual to perform the duties of stenographer and he is willing to do it as a messenger and gets pay as a messenger and performs duty as a messenger, and in addition performs this duty——

Mr. MANN. We do not provide messengers for committees. We used to do so years ago, but we have stopped it. No committee has a messenger. They have janitors where it is necessary to do certain janitor work, but to say we are going to employ a stenographer under the guise of the term "messenger" means that you will have to do that for all committees sooner or later, and it will not be much later. I think the chairman of this committee ought to be satisfied with a clerk at $2,000. I do not think he needs a janitor at all; but if he needs a janitor, take him at the ordinary janitor's salary.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I do not agree at all to the statement that other committees of the House, as the gentleman claims, are going to do ten times as much work as the Committee on Flood Control. I believe there are very few committees that will have more work to do than that committee. The various committees, in addition to these $2,000 clerks, those that have a $2,000 clerk—and many of them have a $2,500 clerk—have not only a messenger but they have an assistant clerk.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In just a second.

The Committee on Accounts has a clerk at $2,500, assistant clerk at $1,800, and then a messenger; the Committee on Agriculture the same thing, namely, $2,500 and $1,800, plus the messenger; the Committee on Claims, clerk at $2,500, assistant clerk at $1,200, and then a messenger; Committee on the District of Columbia, a clerk at $2,500, an assistant at $1,800, and then a messenger; the Committee on Foreign Affairs, a clerk at $2,500, and an assistant clerk at $1,800, and a messenger; the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, a clerk at $2,500, assistant clerk at $2,000, and another assistant clerk at $1,500, and a messenger; the Committee on Indian Affairs, a clerk at $2,500, an assistant clerk at $1,800, and a messenger; the Committee on Invalid Pensions, a clerk at $2,500, one at $2,190, in addition to the expert from the bureau, plus the messenger.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says "messenger," but of course there is no authority of law for saying that. They are janitors.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The Committee on the Judiciary, a clerk at $2,500 and one at $1,600, plus this other employee, whatever you may term him; the Committee on Pensions, a clerk at $2,500 and one at $1,500, and then an expert, and then a messenger; the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, a clerk at $2,500 and one at $1,400, and a messenger; the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, a clerk at $2,500, an assistant clerk at $1,200, and a messenger; the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, a clerk at $2,500, an assistant clerk at $1,800, and a messenger; the Committee on War Claims, a clerk at $2,500, an assistant clerk at $1,200, and a messenger; the Committee on Naval Affairs, a clerk at $2,400, an assistant clerk at $1,500, and a messenger; the Committee on Banking and Currency, the Committee on the Public Lands, and the Committee on Rules, each a clerk at $2,000; but in addition to that they have an assistant at $1,200, plus this messenger.

Now, we have asked simply for the clerk and the messenger, without any assistant—$2,500 and $1,000. That is less than these other committees have, and I know this committee is going to have a great deal of work to do. We ought to have, I think, sufficient force to do the work of the House efficiently, and I can see no reason why we ought to be given less force than the others. We are not asking for any assistant clerk, but simply for a clerk at the salary that the other clerks have, without any assistant, and a messenger, and I hope the House will agree to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Committee on Roads was created last year and it was given——

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Roads was created last session, and it was given a clerk at $2,000 and a messenger at $700. Most of the committees mentioned by the gentleman from Mississippi have appropriation bills or they are committees like the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Claims, which have a very large number of bills to consider. I do not believe that at this time, without any information as to what the duties of this committee will be or how much work it will have to do, we should start it off on a plane different from the others. In order to test the House, Mr. Speaker, I intend to offer an amendment to fix the compensation of the clerk at $2,000 and the janitor, or messenger, at $720.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield me a few minutes?

Mr. LLOYD. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. MANN. Five minutes.

Mr. LLOYD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, those committees of the House which have clerks at $2,500 and janitors at $1,000 are mostly appropriating committees, committees that bring in appropriation bills; and, in addition, the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Claims and the Committee on War Claims, which have an immense number of bills referred to them. Practically it takes the time of the clerk to keep track of the bills that are referred to those committees; and we have in no instance for the ordinary committees of the House departed from the salary of $2,000 for the clerk and $720 for a janitor. We gave the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce extra help and the Committee on the Judiciary extra help because of the immense amount of work that is referred to them. But we give to the Committee on Territories a clerk at $2,000 and a janitor at $720. That committee reports a great deal of legislation to the House. We give to the Committee on Roads a clerk at $2,000 and a janitor at $720. We give to the Committee on Rules a clerk at $2,000 and a janitor at $720. We give to the Committee on Printing a clerk at $2,000 and a janitor at $720. We give to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries a clerk at $2,000 and a janitor at $720; to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands a clerk at $2,000 and a janitor at $720; to the Committee on Insular Affairs a clerk at $2,000 and a janitor at $720. They have very important business before them, and have reported and will report a number of very difficult and complicated bills to the House. We give to the Committee on Immigration a clerk at $2,000 and a janitor at $720.

Now, there is no excuse for giving to the committee which never will have many bills before it the additional pay for their help, unless it is the intention to do it for all of the committees. We ought not to inaugurate a policy unless we propose to extend it to other committees. The Committee on Flood Control, just created, will not have any large number of bills before it. It can not make an appropriation. It has no jurisdiction over expenditure of money, and to put it above the Committee on Roads ought not to be done. Of course I understand that it is desired always by the chairmen of committees to be able to pay large salaries to their help. I have a committee clerk that is worth two of any that I know of around the House, and she gets $2,000 salary, and I guess is glad to get it. I think that ought to be increased to $2,500 or $3,000, and the pay would be well earned. I do not believe we ought to commence to do this thing. If the Committee on Accounts wants to provide all these clerks at $2,500 and all committee janitors at $1,000, let them bring in a proposition of that sort and let the House vote on it squarely and fairly, because you can not do it by piecemeal without creating very great feeling on the part of the other committees.

All of these committees that I have named do more work and have more bills before them than the Flood Control Committee can possibly do or have.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment. I move to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$2,000," and to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$720."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the resolution, in line 3, by striking out "$2,500" and inserting "$2,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 80, noes 28.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LLOYD. There is another amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 5, by striking out "$1,000" and inserting "$720."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DIXON] will take the chair.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, with Mr. DIXON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill.

PENSIONS.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill H. R. 11078.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11078) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURKE. Now, Mr. Chairman, under the agreement entered into before coming into Committee of the Whole, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] is recognized for six minutes.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read the resolution a copy of which he holds in his hand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the resolution referred to.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution.

Whereas the people of the United States are a peace-loving and a peace-seeking people, desirous of maintaining friendly relations with all the nations of the world so long as the same can be maintained with honor; and

Whereas the people of the United States are in favor of the world-wide limitation of armament, the establishment of an international tribunal for the settlement of disputes between nations, and the giving to that tribunal of sufficient power to enforce its decrees; and

Whereas the United States is about to consider the question of enlarging its military and naval forces that it may be in condition to maintain its honor and preserve the lives and property of its citizens, if assailed: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the adoption of this resolution is formal notice to the nations of the world that the United States has only the preservation of its vested rights on land and sea in contemplation in its preparedness-for-defense program and that it seeks only to maintain its principles of free government, unfettered by force of arms of any antagonistic power; and be it further

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby empowered, whenever in his judgment there is a possibility of its accomplishment, to invite the leading nations of the world to enter into a conference looking toward the limitation of armament and the establishment of an international tribunal for the settlement of disputes between nations and the enforcement of the decrees of such court. And for the purposes of defraying the preliminary expenses of arranging for such conference a continuing appropriation of $100,000 is hereby authorized, payable out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used in the discretion of the President of the United States.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced this resolution in the sincere, and to me, sacred hope that it may be adopted by the Congress and signed by our President, thereby officially declaring to our people and to the world that we are preparing for adequate defense of our national rights and not for wars of aggression. I may be mistaken about it, but I believe that, at heart, no patriotic man or woman in our country desires that we engage in war or approves a program that will commit our country to militarism unless it is clearly necessary to do so to safeguard the property and lives of our people from attack.

The adoption of this resolution would do more than proclaim that we are a peace-loving people. It would guarantee to all nations that they need have no fear of trouble with us unless they wantonly invite it, and at the same time it would succinctly set forth that our honor and our vested rights must not be assailed.

My colleagues, war is a horrible thing, as we now see more clearly than ever before. It frequently comes from disagreements that are really trivial in patriotic importance; and that is not the worst of it by any means. It goes into the home and takes the father or the son, or both of them, and sends them to human slaughter pens there to fight relatives, or fellow members of fraternal organizations, or brethren in the same church, or even blood relations, to see which side can pile up the dead and wounded the highest in order to settle questions of diplomacy or the rights of possession.

This resolution seeks not only to openly define our policy of peace but proposes a plan for the ultimate establishment of world peace, and, as such, I beseech you to give it serious consideration. No act of any official head of a nation has ever done so much to declare peace with honor as our President's emphatic decision that our country must not be committed to militarism, and no national act in the history of the world has given so much comfort to the peace and happiness of hearts and homes everywhere as Woodrow Wilson's affirmation of the doctrine of peace on earth and good will to men by his action of yesterday in accepting the resignation of men in his official family out of harmony with the best interests of continued peace in our blessed country. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Did not the President approve the recommendations of the Secretary of War with reference to the continental army?

Mr. BARNHART. I do not so understand.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] is recognized for five minutes.

"FEDERATION OF THE WORLD."

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to speak on the bill pending, and should not but because of the resolution read by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

I could not subscribe to the resolution offered or read in the discussion by the gentleman from Indiana in so far as it would attempt a world's legislative body and court to determine the world's relations. We now make up our international law by treaties and by precedents. The establishment of a world court would mean a world legislature, a world's court, a world's executive, a world's army, and, in the end, such a policy would limit the power of the nations to the detriment of some of them, and particularly the United States.

We remember how our citizens in the early days of the Republic gave up very reluctantly a portion of the State rights in order to make a supreme nationality; and yet that was for a Nation out of States with the same race, with the same religion. But here we are called upon to join the nations of the world, irrespective of race and religion, and many of the world's wars have grown out of race or religion. In doing so we would enter a compact where a majority of those not white would control, and where a majority of religions not Christian would control, and where a majority of those who did not believe in republican institutions would control; and in the end every right dear to us would be sacrificed.

We would first lose the Monroe doctrine in that world's court, because no other nation in the world has ever agreed to it, by treaty or otherwise, as a part of the international law. European nations have obeyed it because our Navy has been strong enough to compel obedience. We would have to abandon the exclusion immigration acts against China and Japan, and, ultimately, this world court would determine our tariff laws and every relation between the nations. To establish international armaments for peace would be a national mistake, suppressing the liberty of the various nations. Such a body appointed by the rulers of the nations of the world, fortified with the armies and navies of all nations, would grasp all national power. I do not know how you look upon it, but, so far as I am concerned, I hope the time will never come when an American soldier will be under the command of anyone or regard the command of any governmental power over and above "Old Glory" when he marches on the field of battle. [Applause.] You can no more determine by a world's court the questions between nations than you can arbitrate all questions. We could not arbitrate the Monroe doctrine or the provisions of our Constitution, containing some distinct principles not otherwise found in the republican governments of the world. We have two not found in other Republics—the right of trial by jury and the total separation of church and State. Who would want to give up one of these? We fought for them; we may need to fight for them again.

I would not risk this to any world's court or to arbitration. This doctrine of a world's court and all the other three propaganda are founded upon the assumption that war can be prevented. War can not and never will be prevented; I do not care what the race or religion or form of government or the degree of civilization. I grant you that the part of the resolution that would seek to disarm the nations of the world by agreement would be wise, but I warn you that until they lay down their gun you had better not lay down your pistol. [Applause.]

Nor can you determine these questions by an overtowering international armament in which the white race and Christianity and republican institutions are in the minority. The only way that the white race can survive is to keep his council to himself. If we do not choose to prepare in advance, as the Anglo-Saxon race has never done, then we will have to meet the issues as best we can as they arise. It does not follow that war comes to any ntaion in proportion to its preparedness, because men fought when they had no armament except the bow and arrow. They have fought at every stage of their advancement up and down the line to the laying of the keel of the latest dreadnaught and the creation of the greatest gun in the world. The only difference has been that in the past the less the armament the more often they have fought and the greater the armament the longer the times of peace and the less the number of wars, but the greater the destruction when war does come. That is why in all the history of the past in all the nations of the world, comparing one century with another, there has been proportionately the same destruction of human life and property whatever the armament.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MURRAY. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is in the control of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. MURRAY. You can never abolish war until you change human nature, and only God himself can do that, because human nature to-day is the same as it was among the ancient shepherd kings of Egypt who built the pyramids. Until you change human nature you can never abolish war, but you can meet it with intelligence, with a view to self-preservation, and self-defense—the first law and duty of nature. If you can get other warring nations to agree to disarm, so far, so good; but whenever you go to a world's court selected by the chief executive of each nation, responsible to no one, then you give to them the power to fix the international law of the world and the relation between nations, as this Nation fixes the relation between State and State, and you turn over to it all of the power over international affairs. And that not only involves armament, but it involves every principle dear to this Republic, every question that would involve a dispute; even the coming to our shores of aliens who do not agree to our institutions, the question of immigration itself would thus be controlled. Even the tariff laws sooner or later and all other questions must be surrendered; and if there should come a dispute between the religion of our Nation and the religion of another, this, together with all race differences, would be determined by that world's court. I repeat again, Mr. Chairman, that others may do as they desire. This propaganda by the Carnegie so-called peace foundation may be good for the men who want to do a world trade and do not want it disturbed by war, but it is dangerous to our race and to our Republic, and I for one will never subscribe to it. [Applause.] I am opposed to it, because I regard it as the most dangerous of them all. We have submitted to us as measures seeking to lead to peace, disarmament, arbitration, a board of inquiry, and wait 12 months before you fight, sometimes called the "grape-juice treaty," and the world's court. I regard the three first as worthy of adoption, but the last one a most dangerous thing to do. I think the other three are wise so far as we can reach them; but the world's-court idea is dangerous because inherently and fundamentally wrong. It is dangerous, too, because Carnegie, with his millions, is behind it. I shall never subscribe to it, because I see lurking therein the snake that would destroy the Republic, the race, and our civilization. [Applause.]

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER].

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, the pending measure has my hearty support. When this bill becomes a law it will to some extent mete out partial justice to something like 155 Civil War veterans, their widows, and their dependent and helpless children. No general pension law can be passed that will not work out in its administration some gross inequalities on account of this or that technicality or some unforeseen condition, although the application of the old soldier may come not only within the spirit, but within the actual provisions of the act.

But, Mr. Chairman, I arose to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole and of the Invalid Pensions Committee to the appeals of thousands and thousands of widows of Civil War veterans who are prohibited from sharing in the benefits of the existing law granting pensions to soldiers' widows because of that provision which requires that the beneficiary shall have married the soldier prior to June 27, 1890. That is, the widow of the soldier who married a few days before that date, or 5 or 10 years prior thereto, is favored by the existing law, while the widow who married the soldier on that date or thereafter, although she may have lived with him as his wife for 5, 10—yes, 20 or 25 years—is excluded.

On the opening day of this session I introduced a bill which will correct, or to some extent ameliorate, this glaring wrong, accentuated by reason of the long lapse of time. This bill proposes to amend the existing law by eliminating this bar to the widows to whom I have just referred, and to reinsert it at a date corresponding to that of the passage of the proposed amendment. I introduced a similar bill in the last session of Congress, and during the closing days of that session I called the attention of the House to the universal sentiment throughout the country in favor of this proposed legislation, and as an evidence of that sentiment I stated that the Senate Committee on Pensions had recommended as an amendment to the Spanish-American War widows' bill, passed by the Sixty-second and Sixty-third Congresses, a provision along the lines that I have proposed.

As a further proof of this strong sentiment throughout the country in favor of this legislation, I now desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that a dozen or more bills have been introduced in this session of Congress providing for such an amendment. These bills start away up in New England, with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], who has been in the forefront of the aggressive movement for preparedness, for a larger Army and Navy, who believes in being thoroughly prepared upon land and sea, who wants this country so prepared that we can resist the assault of all intruders and maintain our honor and dignity at all times and under all circumstances. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] has introduced a bill similar to the one that I have introduced. So from Massachusetts comes a demand for this legislation. New York, the Empire State, represented in this respect by Mr. DALE, has introduced a similar bill. From the great State of Pennsylvania Mr. GRIEST and Mr. BARCHFELD have introduced similar bills, and from Michigan an old Member of this House, Mr. HAMILTON; from Illinois, Mr. FULLER; from Minnesota, Mr. STEENERSON; from Missouri, Mr. RUBEY; from New Hampshire, Mr. SULLOWAY, a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions; from Iowa, Mr. GOOD; from Tennessee, Mr. AUSTIN; from Kentucky, another member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, Mr. LANGLEY; and from Ohio, besides myself, two members of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, including its distinguished chairman, Gen. SHERWOOD, and Gen. HOLLINGSWORTH. The latter's bill would eliminate entirely this bar to any widow of a Civil War veteran.

Mr. Chairman, I have no criticism to make of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I do not want anything I say to be taken as a reflection upon that committee, because I know they have been overwhelmed with work at this session, but, from the fact that four members of that committee have introduced bills along the line to which I have referred, it would seem there ought to be good team work in the matter. We should recollect, however, that while team work has received commendation from high official sources in the past, yet we ought to drive a little faster, for if some of the members of the team become balky it will not receive the high commendation that it would receive if it is pulling all together. We not only want a long, steady pull, but we want a speeding up. To those who are fearful that this might make a large increase in our annual appropriations for pensions, I desire to call their attention to the report of the Senate Pension Committee, in which the Secretary of the Interior states that it would probably entail an additional annual expenditure of $5,000,000, adding something like thirty-five or thirty-six thousand widows to the roll; but I want the committee to bear in mind that that estimate was made something like two years ago, and that since that time the last report of the Commissioner of Pensions showed that for the calendar year 1915, ending June 30 last, there was a decrease of 2,900 of those on the widows' pension roll from all additions thereto for the calendar year. I have no doubt that this calendar year, ending next June, will show a larger decrease, and, in my opinion, it will not entail an additional annual expense of to exceed three million or three million and a half dollars. But, whether it entails an increase or decrease of annual appropriations, I think the time is ripe to wipe out this outrageous discrimination by entirely eliminating or modifying the severity of the harsh bar in the existing law; and to those who favor giving encouragement to the young men to enlist under the call for an increase in the Army and Navy I would say that it is wise that this Congress deal not only liberally with the soldier, but as an assurance that his widow will be provided for in the event he serves in defense of his country, that this Congress pass an act granting pensions to all widows of Civil War veterans. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CRISP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 146. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan, issue, or use quartermaster's and medical supplies for the relief of destitute persons in the districts overflowed by the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

PENSIONS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, as I do not think that the issue is in the least understood, I am going to say a word about the fundamental importance of the militia question, which has resulted in Secretary Garrison's resignation. I shall try to state the case with fairness, so that the House may understand the radical difference between the views of Secretary Garrison and, as I believe, the Regular Army on the one hand and the views of the Committee on Military Affairs and the officers of the National Guard Association on the other.

It is generally supposed that this is a contest between the continental army plan as outlined in the newspapers last fall and a federalized militia plan. That is not a fact. It is a contest between two radically different plans on which it is proposed to build up our secondary army, whether you call that secondary army a National Guard, a federalized militia, or a continental army.

It is true that at first Secretary Garrison outlined a plan for a continental army which to most of us seemed fantastical, and yet all along I, for one, felt that the Secretary was fundamentally right in insisting that the secondary citizen army, by whatever name called, should be beyond the shadow of a doubt absolutely in control of the National Government alone.

Whatever the original plan may have been, Secretary Garrison has long since expressed his willingness to abandon any preconceived superstructure so long as the fundamental idea of absolute Federal control is retained. Therefore the Secretary proposes that the citizen secondary army is to be built up under that clause of the Constitution of the United States which authorizes Congress to raise and support armies. The Secretary long since announced his willingness to take over the existing National Guard or militia of the various States and incorporate its organizations and officers intact in his proposed national militia, which he entitled the continental army.

There is, however, another clause of the Constitution under which the officers of the National Guard Association maintain that Congress by legislation can avail itself of the present Organized Militias of the various States and control them as a federalized force. This clause of the Constitution is known as the militia clause. It reserves to the States "the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress," and in other respects appears to give Congress extended powers over this militia, especially when employed in the national service. Under this militia clause of the Constitution the officers of the National Guard Association, and, if I am correctly informed, the Committee on Military Affairs, believe that the militia can be federalized so as to give control to the National Government to all intents and purposes. The Secretary of War takes the ground that the militia clause of the Constitution must be abandoned as a basis for any citizen army, for the reason that no legislation, no matter how ingenious, can possibly nullify the power of the States to appoint the militia officers and train the militia troops.

Both parties to this controversy have armed themselves with legal opinions and have marshaled court decisions. The Secretary of War and those who agree with him insist that the plans of the National Guard Association, if carried out, will result in the continuation of 48 armies instead of one single federalized army. The National Guard Association takes precisely the opposite point of view, and says that the passage of the militia pay bill, coupled with other legislation, will build up the National Guard, not as 48 different forces, but as one single force. To this the Secretary of War replies that the militia pay bill would simply intrench a system which, as he maintains, we have tinkered with unsuccessfully for the last 125 years.

The officers of the National Guard Association present one argument of a practical nature, which I confess is formidable. They point out the fact that if the National Guard is transported bodily to Federal control, it then becomes necessary for every State to create some new State force of its own, such as exists in Pennsylvania and in Texas, for the maintenance of public order. While I concede the force of this argument, I call attention to the fact that the commission recently appointed by former Gov. David I. Walsh, of Massachusetts, reported in favor of the complete severance of the national militia from State control, and advocated the creation of a separate force for the maintenance of order in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

As I said above, my own opinion is strongly on the side of the Secretary of War, and I believe that the rank and file of the National Guard would be found on the same side if the issue were thoroughly understood. I believe that the average State militiaman would prefer to be under Uncle Sam's control absolutely and unequivocally, without the possibility of any legal complications ensuing. No man wants a Federal army where a lawsuit goes with each order.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD.]

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the other day I made some remarks upon the floor of the House with reference to certain outrages perpetrated by officers in the Indian Service. Inferentially there was some question as to the extent of those irritating and aggravating acts.

I desire now to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating therein a statement forwarded to me by State Senator Gardner, of the State of Minnesota, being a memorial signed by practically every business man of the city of Brainerd in the territory to which I have referred.

Brainerd is a town of some 15,000 inhabitants.

I also ask leave to incorporate some correspondence from one who has been a victim of the same kind of treatment. If that consent be allowed I will not now attempt to further consume the time of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The matter is as follows:

The undersigned citizens and taxpayers of the city of Brainerd and county of Crow Wing do most vigorously protest against the continued enforcement of the so-called "Indian treaty of 1855," and do hereby petition and urge the Congress of the United States to at once abrogate or modify said treaty, especially so far as the same applies or affects Crow Wing County, State of Minnesota. We urge its abrogation or modification for the following reasons:

1. This is not "Indian country" any longer and calling it such and the notoriety it is getting on account of the enforcement of said treaty is greatly retarding the development of not only this county but practically the whole of northern Minnesota, and will continue to retard the same. The methods used for the enforcements of the provisions of said treaty by numerous so-called Indian agents operating throughout the affected country or territory searching men, women, and children on passenger trains and searching places of business are absolutely intolerable and violates our rights as citizens guaranteed to us under the Constitution of the United States.

2. The laws of the State of Minnesota are wholly adequate to protect its citizens and all others who may come within its confines, and we have the necessary means to enforce said laws.

3. After nearly 60 years of existence of said Indian treaty without enforcement of the same, and after conditions within the affected country or territory have wholly changed, it would seem to enforce the same now is ridiculous:

LAPORTE, MINN., February 1, 1916.

Hon. B. M. CHIPERFIELD,
Representative in Congress from Illinois, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: Please allow me to congratulate you on your talk in Congress on the Indian bill question with regard to people being subject to all kinds of indignities by "special Indian agents." I was an agent of the Minnesota & International Railway Co. at this place and called upon by an Indian special officer and asked to allow an inspection of the station and books, and when I asked to be allowed to ask my superior for instructions, declining to allow search without proper credentials, they left without searching or inspecting the station, but wrote a letter to my superior and accused me of aiding parties to evade the Federal laws, and threatening to prosecute and various other things, causing my superior to discharge me, and this after nearly seven years in the company's service, and causing me trouble, so that I finally resigned my situation here after having built my home here and at the age limit, so I could not procure employment with other lines in my profession as station agent and operator, a calling I had followed for over 40 years. Not one of the charges they made against me is true. The name of the special Indian officer writing the letter is Brandt, and the letter was written to the general officers of the Minnesota & International Railway Co., Brainerd, Minn. I am now compelled to accept whatever temporary work I can get to get along the rest of my days, through such work as is around, because I made my home in this part of Minnesota, and it seems real good to have some one get up and defend the common people in this territory. I am in no way a liquor man or engaged in the business.

Yours, truly,

R. R. HURLBUT.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCLEMORE] one minute.

Mr. MCLEMORE. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD by a short memorial from citizens of Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter is as follows:

ENNIS, TEX., February 9, 1916.

Hon. JEFF: MCLEMORE,
Congressman at Large, Washington, D. C.:

At an enthusiastic meeting of the Ennis Commercial Club, with something like 150 members present, the following resolutions, indorsing the course of the President of the United States in his program for the enlargement of the Navy and Army, was adopted:

"That in view of the fact that most of the countries of the civilized world are at war with each other and that by reason of the passion and strife aroused solemn treaties and the laws of nations are being disregarded; that the rights of neutral countries have not been shown a proper and legal regard; that there is imminent danger of the United States being unwillingly dragged into the conflict; and that if this country should be dragged into this war, our Navy and Army are not adequate for the task that they would have to undertake:

"Resolved, That it is the duty of the President of the United States to uphold the dignity of his country and protect the right of its people and to do so, it is imperative that he have a Navy and Army adequate for that purpose;

"Resolved, That by reason of the inadequate force at his command, the President has not been in a position to demand of these countries at war a just recognition of our rights;

"Resolved, That it is not the desire of our President to build up a large Navy and Army for aggressive purposes, but for the benefits of peace, humanity, and the protection of the liberties of the people of the Western Hemisphere; that for the protection of those sacred rights this country should have a Navy and Army large enough to enforce the just and legal demands of the President of this country;

"Resolved, That we indorse the course of the President of the United States in his wise and patriotic efforts to place our Army and Navy on a basis adequate to meet the needs of the people of this country; we know that he is in a position to ascertain and realize what is best, and that we rely upon his wisdom and patriotism to do what is right, and we heartily indorse his efforts to uphold the rights and dignity of this Government and to protect the people in their just rights, and we request that our Senators and Representatives in Congress lend him their assistance and support in this important crisis."

Respectfully submitted.

W. D. FARRIS,
FRED ABRAMS,
J. R. MCMURRAY,
N. J. REYNOLDS,
JOHN H. SHARP,
Committee.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] five minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, a minute ago, when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] was addressing the House upon peace, I asked him if it was not a fact that the President of the United States approved of the position of the Secretary of War upon the question of a continental army. He stated that it was his judgment that the President had not done so. I want to read to you from the message of the President delivered at the joint session of the two Houses on December 7 last, when he said this:

It is with these ideals in mind that the plans of the Department of War for more adequate national defense were conceived which will be laid before you, and which I urge you to sanction and put into effect as soon as they can be properly scrutinized and discussed. They seem to me the essential first step, and they seem to me for the present sufficient.

Going on, Mr. Chairman, he discusses the recommendation and the plans of the Secretary with reference to a continental army as follows:

By way of making the country ready to assert some part of its real power promptly and upon a larger scale should occasion arise, the plan also contemplates supplementing the Army by a force of 400,000 disciplined citizens, raised in increments of 133,000 a year throughout a period of three years. This it is proposed to do by a process of enlistment under which the serviceable men of the country would be asked to bind themselves to serve with the colors for purposes of training for short periods throughout three years, and to come to the colors at call at any period throughout an additional "furlough" period of three years. This force of 400,000 men would be provided with personal accouterments as fast as enlisted, and their equipment for the field made ready to be supplied at any time. They would be assembled for training at stated intervals at convenient places in association with suitable units of the Regular Army. Their period of annual training would not necessarily exceed two months in the year.

He goes on and says:

At least so much by way of preparation for defense seems to me to be absolutely imperative now. We can not do less.

Those, Mr. Chairman, are the words of the President, in which he, in my judgment, approved of the plan and scheme and recommendations of the Secretary of War with reference to the continental army. The President has recently made a tour of the great Central West. He has been to some of the places where the people think and act and know what they want. He made speeches in these various places. He has heard from the people upon the question of a continental army. He has heard from the people through their Representatives in Congress, from the Committee on Military Affairs, and all, and he knows to-day that the continental army is a most unpopular provision of the recommendations of the department with reference to increasing the Army. He knows that, and he knows that the National Guard, the militia of the States, is popular. He knows that their plans and schemes have the approval apparently of a great majority of the Representatives of the people of this country, and now we find that the President differs, apparently, according to the newspapers and according to the speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], with the Secretary of War upon the continental army and is now against it, because he is in favor of peace.

Mr. Chairman, the question is now, as it has been at all times, Will we stand for the citizen soldiery of our country—the National Guard? That is known and understood by everybody as a proper thing to do, and I believe that the President has changed his position; that he would not in the recent past and will not now further continue to uphold the recommendations of the then Secretary of War upon this proposition, is the cause, apparently, of the trouble, and so we have him changing his position again, as he has changed it many times since he has been President, after having his ear to the ground trying to find out what the people want. [Applause.]

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can go ahead under the five-minute rule after the first paragraph is read.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will accept that.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pensions laws—

The name of Joshua R. Matchett, late of Company I, Sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have scant respect for the man who does not seek to win and merit the respect of his associates. I shall consider my service in this body disappointing if, by word or speech or conduct, I fail to acquire, or, having acquired, shall fail to retain to a fair degree the regard of my fellow Members. A Member must not only be honest in material matters, but he must be possessed of mental integrity as well. The classic-faced presiding officer of this body, speaking from the peaks of experience, said early in the session that "a man soon finds his level in the House of Representatives." This bit of philosophy is indisputable. I beg to state, therefore, to the House that I am inspired by the highest of motives, and sincerely desire, insist, and believe that the bill which I am proposing should promptly pass both Houses of Congress.

My excuse for trespassing on the time of the House so early in the morning of my service lies in the fact that those whom I am seeking to serve are falling daily, as fall the ripe leaves when the autumn wind blows its icy breath upon them. In asking this body to pass House bill No. 478, introduced by me on the first day of the session, I do so sincerely believing in its justice, its equity, and its high purpose. Each Member of this body should count it a blessed privilege to support a measure which has for its object the payment of a debt long past due and which seeks to do credit to those splendid men who won the respect and admiration of the world during four years of struggle, but who, with others, were pilfered and punished by those who stalked through the stricken South at the end of the Civil War, not soldiers wearing the honored blue uniform of the Union, but plunderers clad in the drab vestments of greed, with a carpetbag in one hand and an official commission in the other, fattening upon the prostrate and bleeding South. Neither at that time nor since has the carpetbagger been a popular citizen.

Seriously and hopefully I call the attention of Members to the bill which I desire to read into the RECORD and discuss at some length:

A bill (H. R. 478) to pay to Confederate soldiers and to the widows of Confederate soldiers $500 and $30 per month during the remainder of their lives.

Whereas a large amount of money, approximating $100,000,000, was secured and collected from the people of the South during the Civil War and the reconstruction period that followed from the following-named sources: First, from captured and abandoned property; second, from confiscated property; and, third, from the collection of the cotton tax from 1863 to 1868;

Whereas what is known as the "cotton tax" was illegally collected;

Whereas the South, prior to the Civil War and since that time, abundantly proved her loyalty to the Union; gamely lost, without murmuring, 4,000,000 slaves, valued at $2,000,000,000; gave to the country much in military service; and added much territory by the genius and diplomacy of her statesmen;

Whereas 50 years after the unfortunate struggle between the States there exists only a scattered remnant of the gray chivalry that rarely lost a battle, many of whom are maimed and unable to work;

Whereas it is desirable to destroy the last vestige of sectional feeling and emphasize the fraternal spirit that should obtain in a happily reunited country, and to permit a generous and a just Government to recompense in part the South for her losses, not justified by the stern demands of war;

Whereas it is practically impossible to restore the "cotton tax" illegally collected or other property confiscated to the people from whom it was taken during and after the war; and

Whereas the surviving soldiers of the Confederacy are conspicuous and deserving representatives of said section: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the passage of this act there shall be paid to each soldier who served in the Confederate Army and to the widow of any Confederate soldier the sum of $500, and that in addition to such payment such soldiers and such widows shall be paid quarterly the sum of $30 per month each during the remainder of their lives.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be administered by the United States Pension Office.

SEC. 3. That to carry out the provisions of this act the sum of $100,000,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated.

SEC. 4. That this act shall be in force from and after its passage.

I am asking this membership to rise to the occasion and vote for this measure. It elevates a man's soul to rise above petty sectionalism and to reach the greater altitudes. The Nazarene on more than one occasion advised that this be done—when He advised the rich young ruler to give all he had to the poor and to follow Him; when He said that if a man should ask you to go with him a mile you should go with him two. When the United States gave to the Chinese Empire $10,000,000 from the Boxer indemnity fund it won the respect of that great oriental state, and China has ever since been our steadfast friend. Horace Greeley won the respect of the South when he signed the bond of Jefferson Davis. A former Speaker of this House rose to sublime heights on one occasion, the most dramatic, it has been said, that has occurred in this historic House, when he announced voluntarily that the motion to declare the speakership vacant was a question of the highest privilege. Senator WORKS, of California, a Union soldier, rose to great heights when he introduced a bill to donate to the Confederate soldiers the Union Soldiers' Home near Johnson City, Tenn., and to provide that in the future it should be maintained at the expense of the Government. For this graceful act to-day the name of Senator WORKS is spoken with love and reverence throughout the Southland. I am asking the Members of this body, especially those from the North, to perform a patriotic act, which will make history for themselves and make memorable the present Congress.

No man from the South should exhibit any pettiness by objecting to this bill on the ground that the South is not asking any favor from the North and will not accept its money. Such a sinister spirit would be reprehensible and will not be indorsed by the best people of the South nor by the Confederate soldiers. Men of the North, the Union soldiers are not adverse to this bill. [Applause.]

I quote the following editorial from the Union Labor Bulletin, which shows how labor feels toward the bill:

One of the bills introduced in Congress by Mr. TILLMAN, of Arkansas, is for a pension to ex-Confederate soldiers and to their widows. It would seem as if labor, North and South, could support a bill of this kind. At first thought it would seem as if this were rewarding disloyalty, and was so regarded for many years after the Civil War, but the passions engendered by that terrible civil strife have cooled with advancing age of the survivors of those times, and history has taught the generations of the present that if the people of the South erred, it was an error of the head and not of the heart, and an error that carried its own punishment with it.

And it could hardly be called an error of the head, for it was more a falling out among politicians than a difference between the masses of the people, and who can tell how soon we of the North and South may be plunged into just as unnecessary a bloody struggle with our fellow workmen of another nation?

We believe labor stands for an old-age pension bill. Now is an opportune time to commence work on it. A large proportion of the old men of our Nation are drawing a Federal soldier's pension. Let us add to this our Confederate soldiers and then continue the work until we have added to this roll of honor those whom old age has rendered incompetent to labor, those soldiers of industry who have given our Nation its grandeur and power.

Backed by this appeal I ask those Members who represent labor constituencies to support this measure. A pension is sometimes a curse to a young man, but it is a blessing to an old man.

The country has rapidly advanced in recent years in the blessed process of reconciliation. At the close of the Civil War, beautiful Arlington, the home of the Lees, was forfeited to the Federal Government and its high-souled owner driven from the home of his fathers never to return. The country grew, and a Republican Congress appropriated a large sum of money to recompense the descendants of Gen. Lee for the loss of Arlington. While Jefferson Davis was Secretary of War, Cabin John Bridge was built, and the name of Secretary Davis was placed upon the bridge. During the Civil War, when the lust of hate had gripped the souls of the two peoples, some one cut his name from the bridge. The country advanced, until a Republican President, long after the close of the war, ordered the name of Jefferson Davis to be replaced on this bridge. [Applause.]

I knew Union B. Hunt, of Indianapolis, the golden-hearted Pythian, who was loved by both North and South and who was born during the fierce struggle between the States. His people were so loyal to the flag of the Union that he was christened Union Banner Hunt. I remember at the supreme convention held in Boston a few years ago this great-hearted man nominated four southern men for elective positions in the great fraternity which at that time was meeting in Boston and urged their election in lieu of four men from his own section. I heard him state afterwards that a party friend of his in Indianapolis said to him, "Uny, I am afraid if you keep nominating and voting for the southern boys in the supreme lodge you will acquire the habit of scratching the Republican ticket out in Indiana." Later I heard this great Pythian on the floor of the grand lodge of my State, after having made a harmony speech, recite the stirring ode written by Wilbur D. Nesbit:

Your flag and my flag,
And how it flies to-day
In your land and my land
And half a world away.

Rose red and blood red,
Its stripes forever gleam;
Soul white and snow white
The good forefathers' dream.

Sky blue and true blue,
With stars that gleam aright,
The gloried guidon of the day,
A shelter through the night.

Your flag and my flag;
And oh, how much it holds;
Your land and my land
Secure within its folds.

Your heart and my heart
Beats happy at the sight,
Sun kissed and wind tossed,
The red and blue and white.

The one flag, the old flag,
The flag for me and you;
Glorified all else beside,
The red and white and blue.

Your flag and my flag,
To every star and stripe,
Hearts beat as drums beat,
And fifers shrilly pipe.

Your flag and my flag,
A blessing to the sky;
Your hope and my hope,
It never hid a lie.

Home land and far land
And half the world around
Old Glory hears our glad salute
And ripples to the sound.

After that speech this man of the North was smothered with congratulations, and there was not a dry eye in the House. [Applause.]

Not long since at Gettysburg the remnants of the two great armies of the Civil War met to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of one of the decisive battles of the world, the battle that marked the beginning of the end of the effort on the part of the southern people to establish a government of their own. At Gettysburg, where Lee met Meade and the superb Hancock, on a field glittering with the pomp of war; where the fiery waves of battle tossed back and forth during three days of doubtful conflict; where Pickett's Virginians charged in the face of a blinding storm of shot and shell without faltering, planting their battle flags on the Union breastworks and making the most gallant charge in history. An old soldier from Virginia wrote me a few days ago indorsing this bill, stating that the feeling of harmony in evidence at this gathering at Gettysburg was beautiful and delightful and that there was much talk of pensions for Confederate veterans among the Union soldiers. All seemed to favor it.

To show that the war is over so far as the veterans are concerned, the papers and magazines published shortly after this reunion contained a story of human interest to the effect that on a certain part of this field there was a squad of Grand Army veterans while near by stood a group of Confederate soldiers. A member of the first group said to his fellows, "Boys, near this spot, while the battle was raging, I came upon a Confederate soldier who had been stricken by a musket ball and his life-blood was dyeing the ground around him. He begged for water and for help. I picked him up and carried him to one of our hospitals, and there a northern physician treated him and I am told that he fully recovered. How I would like to see that old boy now." At that moment in a near-by group of Confederate veterans, a tottering old Confederate soldier said to his comrades, "Boys, close to this place, if not right here, I was shot down by a musket ball from the enemy and a broad-shouldered, young Union soldier took me up and carried me to the hospital tent of his regiment, where I received medical treatment and recovered from my wounds. I would give all that I possess if I could see that old Union soldier now." The groups were close together, intent upon finding the same spot. The two old soldiers heard one another talking of the incident and in a few minutes were in each others arms crying like a couple of women. [Applause.]

There is but little feeling now between the men who wore the gray with credit and the men who honorably wore the blue. I have heard of a few who wore the blue inveigh against this species of legislation, but for the most part those splendid men who boldly bared their breasts to the hail of southern bullets, who were real soldiers, are too generous to object to this act of justice in behalf of the old Confederate soldier.

As to which side a man took in that great struggle depended much upon where he lived at the time the struggle began. Albert Pike was born in Massachusetts. He lived in my State at the time the Civil War began and enlisted in the Confederate Army, fighting to the end. My instructor in mathematics at college was Col. O. C. Gray, who was born in Maine, but who lived in Arkansas at the time war was declared, joined the Confederate Army, and fought until the conclusion of hostilities. We heard the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] say on the floor of the House a few days ago that his father was a Union soldier, but that if he had been old enough he would have fought in the Confederate Army, and that he favored pensions for both Union and Confederate soldiers.

I prefer to place upon the high ground of justice and right the request for this species of legislation. This is no place to argue the question of which side was right in the war of the sixties. The war had to come, just as the crucifixion of the Nazarene had to come. It was horrible, but it was necessary. As to the right of a State to dissolve the Union, or to secede from the Union, Massachusetts early held the same view as did Virginia and South Carolina. I have always thought, and still think, that, under the Constitution, as it came from the hands of those who made it, as it was understood by those who wrote it and signed it and ratified it, the right of a State to withdraw from the Union was based on sound and constitutional authority. But I shall certainly not go into that issue now. The war settled the great questions submitted, and settled them forever. Slavery was abolished, and the right of a State to dissolve the Union was decided against the South's contention, and the costly verdict was accepted in good faith. The South bases its claim for this legislation upon the highest ground.

The Union owes the South much. Has the South served the Union well? It has. Through the diplomacy and statesmanship of a southern man the Louisiana Purchase was made, the country thereby acquiring a vast section of fertile lands for the small sum of $15,000,000. The Corsican and Jefferson entered into this large real estate transaction, Monroe attending to the details of the same, which resulted in adding an imperial empire to the Republic.

Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, who mothered you in your infantile, savage state? It was a Virginian who gave you to the Union and kept you out of the clutch of Canada.

California and Oregon, who first led white men to your borders? John C. Fremont, a Georgian of mixed French and Virginia blood. In 1846 he wrested you from Mexico and brought to your fertile valleys and golden hills the progressive Anglo Saxon.

Arizona, who was your first governor? This same Georgian, John Charles Fremont, soldier, teacher of mathematics, and civil engineer.

Way back in 1716 Alexander Spotswood explored the Shenandoah Valley, drove the Tuscaroras from the Carolinas, and the expansive spirit of the Virginians and the Carolinians resulted in the settlements of Tennessee and Kentucky.

Who fought the Indians with signal success? Who, on January 8, 1815, defeated Wellington's veteran Britons at New Orleans and drove them back to England? It was a certain Scotch Irishman, a tanner by trade, old "Hickory" Jackson, from the "Waxhaw Settlement" on the line between North and South Carolina.

Men of the North, who opened up the Mississippi River from the mouth to Vicksburg and forced the entrance to Mobile Bay, destroyed the Confederate vessels, silenced the forts, and closed the harbor to blockade runners? It was David Glasgow Farragut, of Knoxville, Tenn.

Men of the North, who was conspicuous for bravery in the service of his country at Monterey and Buena Vista, and who told a timorous company of American troops to get behind his Mississippi wall of men if they were afraid? It was Jefferson Davis, of Kentucky and Mississippi.

To-day the South is all American and is the most loyal section of the Republic.

South Carolina was settled by the Huguenots, who came from the Piedmont Valley in France. James Russell Lowell says of them—

Wherever they dispersed themselves throughout the land, they were among the best citizens, ready to aid in every laudable enterprise.

From them sprang Gen. Marion, Mr. Hayne, John C. Calhoun, the Rutledges, and the Pinkneys.

North Carolina was settled by Scotch, and was the first State to protest against the British stamp act and the first to proclaim her independence. The Mecklenburg declaration is one year older than the Philadelphia declaration.

Virginia was settled by cavaliers and produced Washington, Jefferson, Monroe, and Madison, all of them of the best blood of the Republic. Jeb Stuart, the dashing cavalry officer, had royal blood in his veins, being a descendant of those who filled the Stuart's throne. Mr. Madison caused the Virginia Legislature to call the first general convention to organize a stronger government, and to provide for paying the war debt. The convention met at Annapolis, was not strong enough to accomplish the purpose for which it was called, but it called the convention which met at Philadelphia afterwards. "Light Horse Harry" Lee, the father of Robert E. Lee, offered the resolution in the Continental Congress declaring it to be the right of the States to be "free and independent." Mr. Mason, of Virginia, was the author of the Bill of Rights. Richard Henry Lee, with a face like an English lord, a farmer in Westmoreland County, Va., was one of the first to denounce the usurpation of the mother country. Patrick Henry sent George Rogers Clark into the great Northwest, which was discovered and possessed in the name of Virginia and the Southern States, including this territory, were a good three-fourths of the area of the United States. The South was therefore necessary to a great Federal Government, laid the foundations of the Union, and fittingly did its part in its establishment.

The South always loved the Constitution, and it was not a Southern man who characterized this same Constitution as an "agreement with death and a covenant with hell."

Madison purchased from Spain Florida for $5,000,000. Sam Houston captured Santa Anna at San Jacinto, and James K. Polk, with the help of Zachary Taylor, Gov. Yell, of Arkansas,

Gov. Henderson, of Texas, and other southerners of equal worth, fought the Mexican War and acquired the coasts of Texas and California, New Mexico, and Utah.

The South gave to the country its first great President, the leader of the Revolution, and its first great Secretary of State, afterwards President Jefferson. Edmund Randolph, a southern man, was the first Attorney General, and Madison, prominent in shaping legislation in the House. Virginia gave John Marshall, the first Chief Justice to construe the Constitution and to make it an immortal document, insuring a strong and growing Nation.

The South gave to the Nation some of its greatest literary men, Edgar Allen Poe, Mark Twain, Patrick Henry, Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin H. Hill, William L. Yancey, Robert Toombs, and Alexander H. Stephens.

The appropriation requested is not asked as charity. I have no disposition to stand as a representative of the old Confederate soldiers, poor and maimed, as most of them are, and ask a donation for them. I would dishonor them if I should stand in this body like a smirking, fawning mendicant, cap in hand, and ask a gift for them or in their name.

It is not a pension that I am asking, it is a payment. It is not charity, but justice. It is not a gift; it is a reparation. It is not an advance; it is a return. It is not largess; it is conscience money. Now, let me tell you why.

From 1863 to 1868 there was collected from citizens of the Southern States a cotton tax, amounting in the aggregate to $68,072,388.99, an itemized statement of which I submit herewith. This statement shows the sums of money realized by the Government under the various acts levying a tax on cotton:

1863	$351,311.48
1864	1,268,412.56
1865	1,772,983.48
1866	18,409,654.90
1867	23,769,078.80
1868	22,500,947.77
Total	68,072,388.99

The collection of this cotton tax was under the control of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I am very much interested in my colleague's discussion, as well as in the merits of the bill, and shall vote for his bill. I know he has given much thought and attention to it, because he has been quite industrious along that line. I rise to get some information upon this point. It is currently understood that this cotton tax of $68,000,000 is segregated and set aside in the Treasury and only awaits the action of Congress to bring about its disbursement. I made some investigation myself, and there is some conflict of opinion. I would like to get my colleague to answer that question, if the amount has been set aside, or if any money is segregated in the Treasury for any purpose.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, no; that is not true. The money was collected and has been expended. It is not segregated in the Treasury. You could not put your finger on the identical money, but it was collected without constitutional warrant and should be refunded for that reason.

Mr. THOMPSON. I should like to ask the gentleman if his bill simply provides for the repayment of this cotton-tax money, or if it provides for pensions.

Mr. TILLMAN. The bill simply provides for pensions, for the appropriation of money for that purpose out of the Federal Treasury. This money was expended long ago. But the fact remains that the cotton tax was illegally collected, and a big, just, and generous Government can not afford to keep it any longer.

My insistence is that this tax was illegally collected. The history of its levy and collection involves some curious history.

About four years after the Civil War one William M. Farrington brought suit in the Federal court for the western district of Tennessee against Rolph S. Saunders, collector of internal revenue, alleging in his complaint that Saunders had collected without legal right the cotton tax imposed by the Federal Government. The Tennessee court decided against him, and he appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. A splendid array of counsel appeared in the case. Albert Pike, ex-Confederate soldier, poet, and lawyer, filed a brief that is a classic. Ex-Justice John A. Campbell; former Justice B. R. Curtis; Philip Phillips, who defended Gen. Daniel E. Sickles for killing Philip Barton Key, Phillips at that time being the leader of the Supreme Court bar; ex-Judge Sharkey, of Mississippi; Robertson Topp, of Tennessee; James M. Carlisle, leader of the Washington bar; W. P. Chilton; W. T. Otto; Hughes, Denver, and Peck, of Washington; and William M. Evarts, of New York, one of the great lawyers of the country, all appeared in the case, as well as Attorney General E. R. Hoar, brother of Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, he appearing on behalf of the Government. This volume which I have in my hand contains copies of the briefs filed by these distinguished lawyers.

The Supreme Court at that time was composed of Chief Justice Chase, a Republican of Ohio, appointed by President Lincoln; Justice Nelson, a New York Democrat, appointed by President Tyler; Justice Clifford, a Maine Democrat, appointed by President Buchanan; Justice Swayne, a Republican from Ohio, appointed by President Lincoln; Justice Miller, a Republican of Iowa, appointed by President Lincoln; Justice Field, of California, a Republican, appointed by President Lincoln; David Davis, a Republican of Illinois, appointed by President Lincoln; Justice Strong, of Pennsylvania, a Republican, appointed by President Grant; and Justice Bradley, a Republican from New Jersey, appointed by President Grant—a court composed of seven Republicans and two Democrats, and all nothern men. Although it was a great case, ably argued by the greatest lawyers in the country, and although nearly $70,000,000 was involved directly or indirectly, I find only a short entry of the transaction in the official record of the Supreme Court kept at that period. On Monday, February 20, 1871, the following appears of record:

No. 6. December term, 1870. William M. Farrington v. Rolph S. Saunders, collector of internal revenue, Federal court, western district of Tennessee.

This case came on to be heard on the transcript of record from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Tennessee and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, the court being equally divided in opinion, it is now here ordered and adjudged by the court that the judgment of the said circuit court in the case be, and the same is hereby, affirmed by a divided court.

Chief Justice Chase did not sit in the case, and that is unfortunate. He could have been only temporarily sick or absent. It seems that in a case of such importance a full bench should have participated in the decision. I believe that if the Chief Justice had been present the plaintiff in error would have been given judgment. Of course no one knows how the judges divided; all are now dead, and all that is known of the facts is in the short and simple court annals above cited. In that case there was no decision at all—four for and four against the constitutionality of the tax. I find that Chief Justice Chase participated in the case to the extent of issuing at least one order on the 25th of September, 1867.

Mr. HOWARD. Was the cotton tax itself under discussion in that particular case? Was it the basis of that opinion of the Supreme Court just read by the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes. The suit was brought by Farrington against Saunders, revenue collector, to restrain him from collecting the tax, because it was illegal, as alleged in Farrington's complaint.

Mr. HOWARD. That was the Memphis case?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. The court were evenly divided?

Mr. TILLMAN. Evenly divided.

The question involved in Farrington against Saunders was a question of whether or not the tax of 3 cents per pound on cotton produced in the United States levied by the act of July 13, 1866, was constitutional. The Constitution empowers Congress to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. No direct tax can be laid except in proportion to the census. No tax or duty can be laid on articles exported from any State. Such are the powers of taxation conferred on the United States. Any moneys collected as taxes, duties, imports, or excises under a law that violates any of these provisions or by any mode of taxation not authorized by them has been wrongfully collected, is not the money of the United States any more than if it had been taken by force, and can not be made their moneys by any act of limitation, which, if the time of limitation is so short as to virtually prevent suit, is only one of the means of making the illegal acquisition effectual and a gross abuse of the sovereign power of the Government.

Congress would have had no right to tax products peculiar to the Northern States. Such a tax if persisted in would dissolve the Union. Besides it was vastly more unconscionable, because the price of the cotton received by the taxpayer had also to be accounted for as cotton, and to be taxed again as such, and it was just as much a violation of the provisions that all duties, imposts, and excises should be uniform throughout the United States as if a tax should be laid on the wheat raised in the North. No union of States could exist in which a part of the States were thus treated and taxed, like Roman Provinces paying tribute to a purple-clad Cæsar. The Supreme Court in the income-tax case, in effect, held the cotton tax unconstitutional. (158 U. S. Rept.)

The only way to get back the cotton tax illegally collected is through just such an act as is proposed in this bill, as the matter is res adjudicata.

It was contended by the Government that this money ought not to be returned because the Treasury could ill afford to lose it. That is not argument at all. If this money was illegally and improperly collected, it is never too late to do the just thing, so the present Congress should return it, and inasmuch as it is difficult to find the parties entitled to this tax the best disposition to be made of it is, in my opinion, to make an appropriation of $100,000,000, which will be employed to pay the old soldiers and their widows the pension which they will get under the provisions of this measure, and which would represent the amount collected as a cotton tax, counting only a small interest on the same from the year 1868, the date of the last collection.

There is another item mentioned in the preamble of the bill, an item of dignity and worthy of consideration. The item represents a wrongful taking of a large amount of property from those unable to defend themselves from aggression. On March 2, 1863, Congress passed the captured and abandoned property act. Under this law the Secretary of the Treasury appointed agents to collect and dispose of such property. The Treasury Department soon developed an elaborate machinery for collecting and marketing all captured property. There was a general agent, and he had legions of supervising and local agents. All these were on the trail of property in the South. Transportation being difficult, the Treasury Department offered 25 per cent of the sales to anyone who would deliver cotton and other goods to the agent at a shipping point. A special permit was issued to anyone who would pass through the lines and seize property, and three-fourths of the proceeds were allowed to such. These permits gave license to great seizures of private property. It became such a scandal that the military leaders protested, but without avail. By May, 1868, the gross proceeds of these seizures, much of which property was taken from innocent and unoffending private families, amounted to $25,518,041, representing cotton seized, and $1,309,650, the gross proceeds from other property. Besides, the Federal Government took charge, especially in Mississippi and Louisiana, of all homes and plantations where the owners had fled from the Federal Army.

After the war, when all was confusion, only two years were allowed to prove the right of ownership before the Court of Claims. By this restriction practically all the property was kept by the Federal Government. Stringent tests of loyalty were imposed.

The Government can afford to restore this money also, separate as it is from the cotton tax, and distribute it to the veteran soldiers of the Confederacy, as the legal owners can not now get it.

The South has paid its share of pensions to Union soldiers, and if this bill should pass the South would receive only a small per cent of the amount that has been paid to those who fought on the side of the Union. Up to January 1, 1916, the total amount of money paid to survivors of the Civil War by the Government was $4,614,643,267.43. This amount has been paid in pensions and does not include the amount paid in support of soldiers' homes.

I want to see a continuance of liberal pensions to Union soldiers. I have already succeeded in getting through the House a bill to pension Harriet A. Voelz, a widow living at Garfield, in my district; the widow of a Union soldier and utterly without political influence. No Union soldier and no Union soldier's widow should ever have to go to the poorhouse. Neither should any Confederate soldier, and certainly no Confederate soldier's widow, should ever become an inmate of such a place.

I want to do my duty to this House by giving as much information as possible on the subject of this bill, with a view to ascertaining the facts that Congress is entitled to know. I have tried to ascertain as nearly as possible the number of living Confederate soldiers. About a year ago I wrote to the Confederate Veteran, of Nashville, Tenn., to Gen. Young, of Louisville, Ky., and to Gen. William E. Mickle, adjutant general and chief of staff, United Confederate Veterans, New Orleans, La., and asked for information upon the following items:

How many Confederate soldiers are now living?
How many widows of Confederate soldiers are now living?
How many of them are in soldiers' homes?
How many of them are dependent upon others?
What is their average age?

The editor of the Confederate Veteran writes me in part as follows:

I can not give you the exact information that you desire. We know that the Confederate veterans are dying very rapidly now, and the only records kept are the records of the different Confederate homes, and of course that would only show a small number. While we have no way of ascertaining the percentage of surviving Confederates who are in these homes, it is our belief that one-third will be a liberal estimate. The average age of the surviving Confederate soldiers might be put at 72 years. There are many still living under 70 years of age, still some are considerably advanced beyond three score years and ten. The average age of those in the homes is about 74½. About one-third are in straitened circumstances. The Veteran has always been interested in anything of this kind, and we would like very much to be able to give you definite information along these lines. There seems to be a renewed effort now in favor of an appropriation to secure some pay for the Confederate veterans who are in special need, and it seems but just that they should have a share in what they have so long contributed to the Government. Wishing you success, I am,

Yours, truly,

THE VETERAN,
By E. D. POPE, Secretary.

Gen. Mickle wrote me as follows:

It is a matter of guesswork to give the number of veterans still living. Under the constitution of the United Confederate Veterans all camps are compelled to pay an annual per capita tax of 10 cents. As an instance of how I guess at my results, I may say that last year I collected from all camps $3,335; that would mean about 35,000 men, counting a part of this for back dues, and a number of camps did not pay. I assume that the membership of the United Confederate Veterans is about 40,000. Then, there are veterans who do not belong to the camps, and increases the number, I should judge, to about 45,000 or 50,000 men.

If I can be of any assistance to you, call on me.

WM. E. MICKLE,
Adjutant General and Chief of Staff U. C. V.

These letters were written a year ago, and as the veterans are dying very rapidly, you can make your own estimate of the number living. I will say that my estimate of the number now living was in excess of the above figures.

I believe in complete reconciliation between the North and South. I believe that this measure, if passed, will wipe out the last vestige of sectional feeling between the once warring peoples. I notice a disposition on the part of this House to favor reconciliation. The uplifting classic delivered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] on the 8th day of January, on the subject of the return of the Pelican flag captured from Louisiana troops by Illinois soldiers, lately sent back by Illinois to the descendants of those who designed and made this flag 100 years ago, was well received by this body. The country is reunited. The flag of the Union is the flag of the South, and there is not a star upon its blue field that has not been made brighter by southern courage. There is not one of its red stripes that has not been made richer by southern blood. There is not one of its white lines that has not been made purer by southern character.

The South is doing her share of the work of this reunited country. As Chief Justice of the Supreme Court a Confederate soldier graces the bench once graced by Marshall and Taney. A gifted son of the South presides over the deliberations of this body. A Virginian occupies the White House and honors the chair filled by Washington, Jefferson, Adams, Monroe, Garfield, and McKinley.

The South is doing her share toward defending the country. During the War with Spain the soft-voiced lad from Georgia fought side by side with the Yankee boy from Vermont. The first American killed at Cardenas was Ensign Bagley, from North Carolina, a descendant of a Confederate soldier. Among many other southerners killed in this war was Stockley Morgan, of Arkansas, the son of a Confederate soldier. All that was left of the Mason and Dixon line was wiped off the map when the Maine blew up.

I have received from all over the South letters from those golden-hearted old veterans that are pathetic and will bring tears to the eyes of any man. They breathe the spirit of gratitude. They are for the bill without a single exception, and many of them assert they are in actual need of this relief. They thank and praise me for this poor effort upon my part to get for them what they believe is fairly due them. I have many letters from Confederate widows of the same tenor. I had rather a Confederate soldier would pronounce a blessing upon me for doing that which he indorsed than to have a blessing from any earthly potentate. I had rather be decorated with a blessing from a southern veteran than to have the Kaiser pin upon my breast the iron cross; than to receive from the proud French nation the historic cross of the Legion of Honor; than to receive from King George the decoration of the Star and Garter.

If we could call up the spirits of the mighty dead and marshal them in this Chamber to-day, grim old Stonewall Jackson and the princely Lee, face to face with the modest and magnanimous Grant and the efficient and gallant Sherman; Forrest, the wizard of the saddle, and Jeb Stuart, Cavalry leaders, face to face with the dashing Phil Sheridan; Beauregard, the Hills, Ashby, Ewell, Joseph E. Johnston, face to face with Meade, Siegel, Hancock, and Little Mac, and let them decide this question they would say, "Give the old boys in gray this pittance that they are asking and that is due them, and the God of your fathers will bless you."

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman mentioned one fact about a large amount of abandoned property.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. And mentioned that large amount as an inducement for this pension appropriation?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman kindly develop how that which was taken from the loyal people of the South and transferred to the Government here should be used to pay the pensions of those who were in armed opposition to the Government?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, a large number of these people are dead from whom this property was wrongfully taken. Many of the families have become extinct. They have not asserted their rights to this property in 50 years. These Confederate soldiers are conspicuous representatives of the southern people, and it would be an easier matter, a proper thing, it occurs to me, to return this money to the South in the form of pensions for Confederate soldiers than to attempt to find the identical people from whom this property was taken, or their heirs at law. That would involve tiresome and expensive litigation, the taking of proof and certain failure in the way of finding many of the beneficiaries of legislation providing for the return of the value of this property to those who lost it.

Should we, descendants of those who have gone before, presume to question the wisdom of what we know their verdict would be? Let us get together. The South accepts the result of the war as being a dispensation, not of the great god chance, but of the God of battles and the God of peace. The South wants its brethren of the North to think well of it. We prefer to say nothing that would disparage or discredit either section from this good day.

You will permit me, as the son of a Confederate soldier, who carried to his grave a withered arm caused by a bullet wound in the shoulder received while he was fighting under the flag of the South, to say kind words about the soldiers on both sides. I admire the record of those sturdy veterans of the lost cause who won deathless honor upon every battle field they fought upon, and I am not wanting in pride or respect for the splendid men who marched and fought under the great soldier statesman, Gen. Grant. I admire the courage of the Northern soldier, private and officer, but, notwithstanding the glory that shines on the victorious hosts of Grant and Sherman, it is in deed and in truth no brighter than the white light of the dazzling glory that sheds its golden splendor on the ragged columns of those who fought under the battle-smoked banners of the Confederacy.

I love the South and I love her people, as brave and as generous a people as God's sun ever shone upon. Ever since I have had a home of my own I have had hanging upon the wall two pictures which I greatly value. It is an inspiration to look at them. One is the portrait of a man with iron gray hair and beard, the kind and manly face of a Virginia gentleman. "When you look upon his face he looks a chief, who fears not human hate nor human guile; on his cheek the twilight of a grief, but in that grief the starlight of a smile." "He was a foe without hate and a friend without treachery; a public officer without vices and a private citizen without wrong." The other is the picture of a rugged and homely man, with black hair and beard, and with the firm lips of a fighter. He was a puritan in morals, but a cavalier in the saddle. He followed the injunction of Shakespeare, who said, "In peace there's nothing so becomes a man as modest stillness and humility, but when the blast of war blows in our ears, then imitate the action of the tiger." He prayed and fought and fought and prayed. Under his slouch cap was the brain of a remarkable military genius. Behind his gray coat beat the heart of a sincere patriot—the pictures of Lee and Stonewall Jackson, and as long as I have a roof to cover my head those pictures will continue to have a place in my home. [Applause.]

Sentiment is not unworthy and not a rare virtue of the people of the South. The South after the Civil War was a land of ruins, but men are brought solemnly together in ties of eternal friendship in a country that has been devastated and whose people's sufferings have been great. A land without ruins is a land without memories and a land without memories is a land without history. No one will quarrel with our people because they love the memory of their illustrious dead; because they refuse to forget Price or Forrest or Gordon or Beauregard or Albert Sidney Johnston.

Is it wrong to listen to the waves that still will glisten
Where the wreck we loved went down?
Is it wrong to watch the willows that are drooping o'er the grave?
Is it wrong to love our brave?

During the last 50 years, in the shadow of a blessed peace, the stout-hearted old Confederate soldiers have acted the part of men. They have rebuilt their burned homes; they have reared their families in comfort and in honor; they have respected the stranger and the stranger's rights; they have done their duty to their country, to their neighbors, and to their God; and they have wrought works that do them credit.

In speech and in conversation we are prone to extol the virtues of those who are dead, and it is a worthy sentiment, but we should not forget the living. Murphy, the great temperance lecturer, was very fond of a red rose and usually wore one in the buttonhole of his coat. He used to say, with rich Irish accent, "My friends, I would rather you would bring me one red rose while I live, that I may admire its beauty and inhale its fragrance, than to wait until I am dead and bring a whole wagon full of roses and shove them down on my grave and say, 'Murphy, shmell of them.'" We should not spend our time in idly and lavishly praising the dead to the hurt or neglect of the living. We are sometimes inclined to picture the dead greater than they really are.

A king once said of a prince struck down:
"Taller he seems in death."
And his speech holds true, for now, as then,
'Tis after death that we measure men;
And as mists of the past are rolled away,
Our heroes who died in their tattered gray
Grow taller and greater in all their parts.
Till they fill our minds as they fill our hearts.
And for those who weep in this belief,
That glory sits by the side of grief.

Now, let us not forget the rapidly diminishing band of living heroes, who fought through four bloody years of war, who have lived to be old, and who are now in want. [Applause.]

The country has progressed. Fifteen or twenty years ago a bill of this character would have had scant hearing in this body and in the country. Senator WORKS last year wrote to Gen. J. R. Gibbons, of my State, commenting on his bill, and, among other things, said:

I do not see why the South should have any feeling of injured pride on account of the Government furnishing aid and comfort and giving cheer to these old men. The time has certainly come when this can be done without offending the sense of patriotism on the part of any citizen. In the United States Senate at this time there are five Union veterans and five Confederate soldiers. One of the Confederate soldiers is a Member who has occupied the chair next to mine for a long time. I am glad, indeed, to do what I can to bring about this beneficial and patriotic act on the part of the Government of the United States. I hope that the people of the South will appreciate the fact that this is done only in the effort to do what seems to me to be a worthy and a patriotic act on the part of our Government.

He was speaking about his bill proposing to turn over the Federal soldiers' home, near Johnson City, Tenn., to the Confederate veterans.

As above stated, the bill I am discussing is growing rapidly in popularity. Many of the great papers of the South are calling attention to it. In a recent issue of the Montgomery Journal, an influential paper of Alabama, is a lengthy editorial indorsing the measure, a few sentences of which I beg to quote:

There could be no more fitting time than the present, while there are wars and rumors of wars, for a practical recognition of the South as an integral part of the United States.

Speaking of my bill the editor, Mr. Horace Hood, says:

This bill is most timely. It is timely in that it is a time for closing up the ranks; letting the dead past be forgotten, as it has long been forgiven; and let the North demonstrate in a practical way that there is no recognition of any section to the exclusion of any other or any sectional differences; that we are one and the same, not only in spirit and purpose, in loyalty and devotion to our country, but in sentiment that shows itself in a practical way that is being practically demonstrated, and is just recognition of as brave a foe as ever was met upon the bloodiest of battle fields.

If we mistake not, on one occasion, when the late President McKinley visited New Orleans, he was so royally treated by the Confederate veterans of Louisiana that he said in his address on that occasion that he had not dreamed that there was such a kindly and patriotic feeling among the Confederate veterans, and he was so gratified by his reception and the enthusiasm displayed that he promised when he returned to Washington he would have one of the Members of Congress from his State of Ohio to introduce a bill to put the Confederate veterans on the pension roll. And he tried to keep his word, but a few hot-headed southern Members of Congress, hot-headed at that time and pardonable, but not pardonable now, advised against the proposition, declaring it was an insult to the Confederate soldiers; that they did not have to be paid to be loyal to the Government; and, of course, the idea "died a bornin'" in the house of its friends.

I quote below extracts from the Macon Telegraph:

This bill appeals with great force to the veterans of the South. The Grand Army of the Republic favors pensions by the Government for surviving Confederate veterans. The Government can afford to restore the money improperly taken under the law governing seizures of cotton and other property. For its fame, for its social peace, for its pride of national honor, the Government should no longer refuse to return this money, and, as the legal owners can not now get it, let it be paid to the old soldiers and their widows.

Let us not forget the few remaining Confederate soldiers. They have received as medals only scars, and for their loss of time, blood, and money, their loss of the opportunity to obtain an education, no money compensation. They will soon pass away and shall dream no more of the glories they won in battle.

Out of the gloom of vanished years
A column is marching to-day;
Fling out your banners and greet them with cheers,
The heroes in jackets of gray.
Onward they march to the land of the blest,
Onward o'er life's dusty way;
Soon with their comrades in peace they shall rest,
Shall rest in their jackets of gray.

Brethren of the virile North, the South deserves your good opinion and is entitled to your hearty and fraternal "God speed and good luck." There is no fairer land. When God made Dixie he was in a particularly happy frame of mind. He swept the wide universe with his mighty eye, and reaching out his generous hand he gathered together, in the twinkling of an eye, a thousand square miles of blue sky and unrolled it like a scroll from the Ohio to the Gulf and from ocean to ocean. He lighted it by day with the same smiling sun that shed its brilliant rays over cultured Athens in the golden age of Pericles, and shone over happy Italy when Horace sang of the field and the vine. He sowed this blue sky with stars that look like angels' eyes. He planted in the south seas the Southern Cross and flooded the blessed land with flowers and sunshine. He peopled this section with a self-respecting manhood and a womanhood as pure as the pond lily's spotless leaf. He caused to develop here an "upright race who love the land because it is their own, and scorn to give another reason why, who would shake hands with a king upon his throne and think it a kindness to his majesty." [Applause.] The South has grown apace. It now has a population of over 27,000,000, 4,000,000 more than the United States had in 1860. In 1860 the capital invested in all American enterprises was one billion, while now the South alone has two and one-fourth billion invested. The total value of all agricultural products in 1860 in the United States was one billion seven hundred and fifty million. Now southern farms are turning out two and one-half billions of agricultural products annually. In 1860 the United States had a total wealth of sixteen billions. To-day the wealth of the South alone is estimated at twenty-one billions.

It is a land of orchard and grain, a land of rice and cotton, a land of golden Indian summers, a land of gorgeous sunsets, and the moon sails through the blue seas of her cloudless nights like a ship of pearl. It is a land of enchantment and variety, here a stately country home, there a big plantation, with its broad, fat acres laughing under a harvest of good things. The mockingbird sings until midnight among the fragant magnolias, the pink peach blooms, and the purple apple blossoms. Here is the fragrant pine, there the cedar, dusk and dim; here the virile white oak, there the branching elm, there the stately mountain range; there a lake of silver, there by the roadside a bubbling spring ever holding up its pouting lips to be kissed by the thirsty traveler. [Applause.]

God made the South, and when He had finished this masterpiece He saw it was good, and said, "Moreover this is my country, my South, and behold it was so."

Let no Harry Hotspur of the South say in this Chamber that he would scorn to accept from this Government any help for the Southern soldier. Why not leave this matter of acceptance to the soldier himself? And let no Member from the great North say that disloyalty should not be rewarded. Such declarations will tend to destroy the blessed peace that now hovers over the two sections, and "pour the milk of concord into hell."

In a war museum in Chicago there is a certain miracle in lead. It was made by the impact of two bullets fired in one of the battles of the Civil War. Two leaden messengers of death sped through the air from the opposing lines, hissing the hate felt by those who fired the shots, one from a Northern rifle, the other from a Southern musket. Meeting midway between the battle lines they melted into a solid leaden star. This leaden star now exemplifies the unity of the once hostile sections, now happily welded together, emblematic of the feeling prevailing among peoples now claiming one flag, one country, and one God. [Applause.]

At the beginning of the year there were some sharp passages between the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. I quite agree with the first two gentlemen, that we should not be hostile to these American citizens who were born under foreign flags, who now love America, but who have not forgotten the land of their birth. We have many loyal French-Americans, Russian-Americans, British-Americans, German-Americans, Scandinavian-Americans, who love our country and are a credit to it. Nor should we unduly criticize Massachusetts or Boston. I remember that a certain memorable and highly creditable tea party occurred at Boston, attended largely by Boston people. I remember the midnight ride of Paul Revere. I remember that the shot that was fired at Lexington was heard round the world. Nor should we forget a certain monument, piercing the sky like a giant's spearhead, attesting a very worthy enterprise occurring at Bunker Hill.

The cost of these pensions will be a mere bagatelle. This great Nation is now the richest in the world and well able to pay them. The Republic is too great to deny this relief. This Nation will live forever. Southern valor could not destroy it, and what southern valor could not destroy the world need not attempt.

We are partial to the South, and you would not respect us if we were not. Somehow "Dixie" raises more enthusiasm in the South than does "Yankee Doodle." "Dixie" is the best war tune ever written. [Applause.] It is such a stirring air and one so full of South-loving sentiment, and written by Dan Emmett, of Ohio; God bless him. There is that in the music that tells of the magnolia and the palmetto; that is eloquent of the cotton fields and the broad acres of the old plantation; that tells of the mocking bird, the violet skies, the land of beautiful women and gallant men, the land of flowers and sunshine and chivalry. God pity the man of the South who refuses to yell when the band plays "Dixie." Somehow "Down Where the Cotton Blossoms Grow" sounds better to us than does "John Brown's Body." Somehow "Down on the Cumberland" is a little more musical than "Up on the Wabash." Somehow "'Midst the Old Virginia Pines" suits our fancy better than "Way Down in Maine." Somehow "My Old Kentucky Home, Good Night," is more suited to our taste than "Marching with Sherman Through Georgia." Somehow "Surrey of Eagle's Nest" reads better, we think, than "Uncle Tom's Cabin." And the virile, brave, red-blooded men of the North commend us for this sentimental loyalty.

Men of the North and the West and the East and the South, the soldiers of the Confederacy are old and are rapidly growing older. Their ranks are thinning faster than when the men in blue poured deadly hail into their faces. One by one God is touching them with His finger and calling them home. The world is better for their having lived in it, and will miss them when they are gone. The cause they fought for was lost, but they will leave behind them a record of stainless honor more to be desired than victory. The red badge of courage has ever been a passport to respect, and courage they had to the point of recklessness. In a few years the sturdiest of them will strike his tent for the march which will end in the great hereafter. There he will meet the kingly Lee, who said at Appomattox, "Boys, I have done the best I could for you; go home and make good citizens." There he will meet the eagle-souled Stonewall, the peerless Albert Sidney Johnston, Price, Cleburne, Ewell, Pickett, the Hills, and Longstreet, as gallant a company of heroes as God's sun ever shone upon. There he will meet many a gallant spirit who fell in the ranks with his face to the foe. That will be a grand reunion.

Remembering the dead, let us not forget the living. Let us cleanse our souls by the act of justice contemplated by this bill. Let us pay an honest debt. Let us give over this conscience money to those who are entitled to it, to those who will appreciate it, to those who need it; and by this act of equity and generosity we will bind together with hooks of steel the North and South and thus form a "more perfect Union." [Applause.]

Mr. THOMAS S. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to withdraw my vote and to answer "present." I am paired with the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HILLIARD].

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALLEN). A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill, H. R. 10484, with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] for one hour. [Applause.]

ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the bill now before the House for consideration carries an appropriation of $320,000,000, a large sum, representing more money than is expended by any other department of the Government.

The Post Office Department is one of the most important activities of the Government. It should be conducted by men having scientific knowledge of the subject. And while every man who has been in charge has done the very best he could to give a good account of himself, I still believe that in the conduct of a great business enterprise like this we ought to have men trained to the service to manage this wonderful institution. [Applause.]

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, consisting of 21 Members of this House, have given serious consideration to every question affecting the welfare of this great department. In the course of our deliberations we have endeavored to do everything within our power to assist the management in reaching conclusions that will make for the efficiency of the department. In the work of this great committee there has been no politics, and there ought to be none. Everybody connected with the department, from the Postmaster General down to the most inconsequential laborer in the service, should cooperate. If we could have the kind of cooperation that might be brought about by a harmonious feeling in every branch, I believe it would redound to the benefit of the American people. The Postmaster General, whom I have known well and favorably for a good many years, is a patriotic man. He is doing the work imposed upon him in this great department as he believes it ought to be done. He is endeavoring not only to facilitate the movement of the mails, but he is also endeavoring to systematize the service so as to bring about the best results. I presume that all will not agree that he has accomplished the best results. No man in that place ever will, for his judgment may be totally different from the judgment of other men who are no less patriotic than he. Whether he has made mistakes or not, I am perfectly satisfied that it has been and is his purpose to serve the American people in the responsible position which he occupies to the very best of his ability.

There have been some rumblings of dissatisfaction heard in several quarters; some in the rural-delivery sections of the country on account of the action taken by the Postmaster General and his assistants. There have been rumblings of dissatisfaction heard among the clerks and carriers in the first and second class offices of the country; and I have no doubt that those rumblings of dissatisfaction have had some merit, for in many instances rural routes have been changed from what they formerly were, and some disturbances in the delivery of mail have resulted from these changes. But time alone can tell whether these changes will result in real benefit to the department. There have been in great cities reductions in the salaries of the men employed as carriers, and in many cases I believe these reductions were unjust. This committee recommend to the favorable consideration of the House a restoration of these men to their former status, and we provide, if our recommendation be adopted, that there shall in the future be no distinction made in the compensation of carriers, whether they be assigned to collection or delivery duty. [Applause.]

We have on former occasions recommended the enactment of legislation, which has been concurred in by this House and by the Senate, which provides that where men in the Postal Service have been injured while on duty they may be given full compensation for one year during their period of disability, one-half pay during the second year of disability, and that $2,000 may be paid to their heirs in case of death as a result of the injury.

The legislation heretofore enacted did not cover all the civil-service employees in the department, and this bill contains a provision that all other classified civil-service employees in the Post Office Service shall be covered by this provision.

SPECIAL CLERKS.

This bill provides that special clerks may be taken out of the supervisory class. It provides that clerks performing special duties—expert distributors, if you please—shall be promoted from twelve to thirteen hundred dollars and from thirteen hundred dollars to fourteen hundred dollars at the rate of 5 per cent of the number of clerks employed in that branch of the service during the coming year. This is a step in the right direction, for, as a matter of fact, while on its face it does not say so, in terms it increases the compensation of the clerks in the first-class offices from a maximum of twelve hundred dollars to a maximum of fourteen hundred dollars per annum. [Applause.] Then, too, this bill provides that clerks in second-class post offices may be promoted, 75 per cent of them, from the fourth to the fifth grade, which is from ten hundred dollars to eleven hundred dollars, and 5 per cent from the fifth to the sixth class, which will add a new class, or make the maximum salary paid to clerks in the second-class offices throughout the United States twelve hundred dollars instead of eleven hundred dollars as heretofore. So that we are endeavoring in the consideration of the great work in which we are engaged to recognize the importance of the employment of the men, for we realize that with the increased cost of living there is greater need than ever before for cooperation and encouragement, to the end that the American people may see a sense of satisfaction in the servants who are engaged in sunshine and in rain in bringing them their messages of love, of hope, and fear every day. [Applause.] This department alone is the one department that deals with every man, woman, and child in America, and it is more important than ever before that all that can be done to make the American people realize that the department is their department shall be done.

LABORERS.

The great laboring force of the department has been badly compensated in the past, and these men are employed at arduous and hazardous employment. They carry mail bags weighing from one to two hundred pounds from early morning until late at night, and from late at night until early morning, and up to this time 900 of them have been paid $720 a year and 900 of them $840 a year. This bill provides that there shall be no distinction, but that all men doing like work shall be paid like pay, and so we have increased the compensation to $840 a year, and we hope later on to report a bill to put them into the classified service. [Applause.]

CLERKS AND CARRIERS.

Letter-carrier substitutes and clerks have been heretofore paid 35 cents an hour for one kind of work and 40 cents an hour for another, and the department on this occasion recommended that they all be reduced to 35 cents an hour, but I am proud to say that without a dissenting vote the committee was unanimous against this reduction. I believe the men who have passed a civil-service examination for entry into this complicated service, who have specialized especially for the work, who are required to work from three to four years on a miserable compensation of $25 a month on the average while acting as substitutes, ought at least to be paid compensation commensurate with the sacrifices which they are obliged to make. No man entering the service is able, after he has been appointed as a substitute, to receive a permanent appointment until he has served from three to four years on the substitute list, and during all of that period he is required to report for duty every day and pay his car fare from his home to the post office and from the post office to his home, and in many cases without receiving any employment whatever. So that when he receives a permanent appointment, he owes every one from whom he can borrow money, and our duty to him is to make the necessity for borrowing as light as possible by paying not 35 cents an hour but 40 cents an hour. Heretofore clerks and carriers have been obliged to work on holidays without any additional compensation. They will undoubtedly be obliged to continue to do duty on holidays, but your committee feels that for all such work compensatory time off should be granted within the succeeding 30 days, and we have included a provision in the bill to that effect, which we submit to the consideration of the House.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will let me finish, I will be glad to yield when I am through. Up to this time railway mail clerks in charge of railway post-office cars have been required by the rules of the department to give three years' continuous service before they are entitled to promotion. If by any chance the train on which a man is serving as clerk in charge be laid off after the man had served two years and nine months as a clerk in charge, though it be laid off for only a week, and he is restored to duty, he is obliged under the former rules and laws to begin the service of a three-year period over again before he is entitled to promotion. This bill removes that inequality and that great injustice by striking out the word "continuous," and thus giving him credit for all time served, whether the train is running or not, which is a just measure of consideration to those men. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the time has come in the management of this great department, which is increasing by leaps and bounds, whose revenues are going up so fast that we can not keep track of them, when in the consideration of the disciplinary measures among the men no man ought to have the power to make rules by means of which any injustice can be done to any patriotic, worthy man, and the time has come when I believe there ought to be a board, before whom men should be called when charges are preferred against them [applause], where they can have their cases tried in the open and where the record of a man may be reviewed, so that no such injustice can be done as has been done during the past year. In Chicago, my home city, we have more than 225 men who served faithfully for more than 20 years as carriers with records without a blemish, with no charge of any kind preferred against them during all the history of their service, whose efficiency rating averaged 95 per cent out of a possible 100 every day from the beginning of their service, and who by means of the rules in force found themselves at the end of a day's work, at 6 o'clock at night, with a record of 95 out of a possible 100, and when they reported for duty the next morning at 8 o'clock found their record to be 58, without rhyme or reason, without any cause, so far as they knew, except that they were considered not quite so rapid in the performance of the work which they had been doing as they were when they were a little younger.

Now, I believe that wise business management would dictate that where a man has given excellent service during the best of his life that when he begins to slow up a little on account of age that those places known as collectors' places, which are said to be easier than the places of carriers, ought to be given to those men as a reward for merit without a reduction of compensation. [Applause.] A wise business manager in all the commercial activities of life realizes the necessity of maintaining the confidence and the cooperation of the men who are employed in the institution, and wherever the institution is strong enough and its earning power sufficiently regular to justify the payment of pensions, the pension system is being inaugurated throughout the country and throughout the world. And if we have men in the Postal Service and other branches of the Government service who have given faithful service to the people of America during all their active lives, and they are getting along with their faces turned toward the setting sun, we ought to seriously consider the question of what we shall do for them, how we shall maintain the integrity and the efficiency of the service, and how we shall dispatch the business the most economically and to the greatest satisfaction of the American people. So, the time is coming, and it is not far off, when we must give serious consideration to the cases of men who are no longer qualified to do a young man's work, and it would seem more economical in my judgment to have a scientific method of retirement than it is to maintain men who are no longer qualified upon the Government pay rolls. [Applause.] There will be differences of opinion about this, and it is a question about which there ought be, and no action should be taken upon a question of this great importance until it has been thoroughly investigated from every angle, and for one, I want to be understood as being in favor of cooperating in every way I can with the executive officials of the Post Office Department to bring about better conditions among the men, to bring more satisfaction to the homes of the American people. And there is no politics in it with me, and there ought not to be any politics in the conduct of this, the greatest department in the American Government. [Applause.] I hope to see the day when every man will be held in office on his merit, when he will be an expert, when he will be a specialist, and when these men have qualified themselves as specialists and have given their very lives to the service of a great department of the Government, and have proved their worth and their right to confidence, I hope that no party will ever come into power which will not sustain these men in their right to occupy the places in which they have given satisfaction. [Applause.]

LIABILITY INSURANCE.

Now, I have dwelt a long time upon these problems. They are the most vital problems in connection with this bill. We have before us a proposition here to take over the liability insurance under which we have been insuring the contractors who have contracted with the Government of the United States for the transportation of mail by star route and by screen wagon, and we have, in the consideration to this important question, disclosed a condition which has led most of the men of this committee to believe that something ought to be done to prevent future scandals. We disclosed a condition in one case where a combination of contractors running all the way from San Francisco to Boston were being protected by certain liability insurance companies to the exclusion of other contractors who were attempting to offer bids. We disclosed a condition which to us seemed unjust and unfair to the American people, and it ought to be remedied, and the department placed at the disposition of our committee information which led us to conclude that legislation ought to be enacted by means of which the insurance of contracts to be let by the Post Office Department should be issued by the department itself, so that no future scandals could be developed. [Applause.] The result of the investigation disclosed the fact that three men, in order to obtain contracts, entered into a conspiracy with some men who were engaged in the insurance line that they would protect them against all other contractors, and this conspiracy became so manifest and the evidence developed was so glaring that, although the men who were engaged in this conspiracy as contractors were Democrats, the Postmaster General, notwithstanding that, notwithstanding the appeals of many of his own party followers, said that, regardless of any scandal that might occur as a result of the prosecution, those men must go to the penitentiary, and they are there. [Applause.]

And I congratulate the Postmaster General upon his action, and in the face of this I see no reason why this House should not agree with, first, the Postmaster General in his recommendation to take over these insurances and allow the Government to do the work itself; and second, agree to the recommendation made by this committee which is the result of careful consideration. Then as to the fidelity insurance to be given by the men employed in the service, we provide in this bill that this service shall be taken over by the Post Office Department, that a fund shall be accumulated through levies of assessments upon the men; that those levies shall not exceed 75 per cent of the present cost of the insurance to the men; and that the men themselves can have the option of giving a personal bond or a surety company bond or they may contribute to the fund proposed by the department. And the provision further provides that there shall be no expense whatever to the Government of the United States in the administration of this fund. Although personally opposed under ordinary circumstances to this sort of thing, and generally opposed to the Government of the United States entering upon any enterprise that stops individual initiative or comes into competition with the individual citizens of the United States, I can conceive of no reason why under the present conditions this great business institution of ours known as the Post Office of the United States ought not to have the same right to carry its own insurance that any big business institution of the United States in private activity has and often assumes. [Applause.]

Now, I come to what I consider the most important question that has been before the House for a long time. It involves the transportation of the mails.

RAILWAY MAIL PAY.

It involves the expenditure of a vast sum of the money of the people. It involves the question of the integrity of the transportation companies of the United States. This is a great problem. I realize and gladly acknowledge that there is no instrumentality in America more entitled to credit for the advancement of the prosperity and civilization of the country than the railroads. I believe that they ought to be treated with every proper consideration. They ought to be maintained in a prosperous condition, if it can be done, without undue governmental aid. They ought to be given that consideration to which every great instrumentality in the fabric of American life is entitled, and so when we begin to consider the question of pay for the movement of mail I want every man here and every man in America to realize that we have considered this question with the end in view that whatever conclusion reached would be reached with the intention of doing ample justice to the railroads.

There is no man on this committee who has any antipathy to railroads. On the contrary, every man on the committee is the friend of railroads. When I say "the friend of railroads" I do not want to be understood to mean that we are in favor of paying a higher price to railroads for the work they do for the Government than we would pay to somebody else for doing like work. On the other hand, I do not believe that we ought to pay less to the railroads for doing the work they do for the Government than we would pay to anybody else for doing that work. Your committee has considered this question on the theory that we are speaking for all the people, recognizing the railroad companies as a part of the people, but realizing that if we gave the railroad companies more than they are justly entitled to receive that we would be unjustly increasing the burden of taxation on the rest of the people. On the other hand, we do not believe that we ought to lighten the burden of taxation on the rest of the people by taking away from the railroad companies anything to which they are entitled in compensation for the work they perform for the Government. We are here, in the first instance, as I said, to represent all the people, and we recognize the railroads as an important part of all the people. But they are not all the people. And we speak, if we speak justly, not for the railroads alone, but for all the people. And as the representatives of all the people dealing with a part of the people, we must be just to every interest.

We represent the buying power, so to speak. The railroad companies represent the selling power, dealing in commodities. We are trying to buy railroad transportation to move the mail, and we are offering a price that we believe is commensurate for their service. The railroad companies are offering to sell the service. Now, the question is, should the Congress have anything to do with fixing the price or should the railroads fix the price, or should the railroads and the Congress combined agree upon the price, or is there any power within the Congress to say what the railroads must do and the price at which they shall do it? This question has been given serious consideration. This consideration has covered a long period of time.

In 1912 Congress appointed a commission to investigate the question of railroad mail pay. That commission sat for two years. It heard evidence from every source. Every railroad man who wished to be heard was given an opportunity to present the railroad side of the case. The Post Office authorities were given an opportunity to present their side of the case. The joint commission, sitting for two years in the study of this question, called Dr. Loraine, the expert statistician of the Interstate Commerce Commission. He tabulated all the figures that were deduced as the result of these investigations, and he concluded, and the commission concluded, that the time had come when, instead of carrying mail by weight, we ought to carry the mail by space. [Applause.]

So when the commission was ready to report the question was taken up in the last Congress by the Post Office Committee. That committee did not agree exactly with the commission. They reported a bill which in many respects was similar to the commission bill, but the prices agreed upon by the committee were not as high as the prices agreed upon by the commission.

Suffice it to say that the bill reported by the committee to the House in the last session of Congress was approved. It was sent to conference. In the conference the conferees agreed to increase the rate over the bill passed by the House. These increases in rates amounted to $1,100,000. With those increases agreed upon in conference and all of the rest of the bill agreed upon, the conferees reported it back to the House. The House approved the conference report. The report went from the House to the Senate. It was during the last hours of the Congress. The Senate did not reach the consideration of the bill, and the bill failed. And we came to the consideration of this question again at the opening of this Congress, and the committee invited the railroad companies of the United States to come before them that they might present their case again. And we gave them three days in which to testify. The railroads were represented by able men. There were 227,000 miles out of 250,000 represented at these hearings. They talked for three days. They presented their case. They analyzed the conditions. They said they were not well paid; that they did not believe in space. They believed that the adoption of the space plan would take away from the railroads some of their high-class freight; that it would be sent by mail instead of by freight, and that the adoption of the space plan would enable the loading of storage cars with 20 tons of mail matter, whereas the average load on a storage car now is but 7½ tons. But, if anybody would stop to think, while the capacity of a storage car is 20 tons, it would be impossible to load the storage car with 20 tons of matter unless it was solid matter, like books. It would be absurd to believe the statements made by the railroads to the effect that we would take away from their first-class freight and carry in storage cars the things that ought to be paid for as freight and carried in other trains.

The Merchants' Association of New York, a very patriotic body, consisting of a great many prominent merchants, sought to analyze the railway mail proposition. They presented an analytical statement of the case to your committee. That analysis of the Merchants' Association was presented by Mr. Peters. He gave testimony. By the way, he is president of the Long Island Railroad and chairman of the Railway Mail Pay Committee of the United States. While Mr. Peters was testifying we reached the stage where I personally wanted to examine him with respect to this statement made by the Merchants' Association. Mr. Peters said that he would turn the answers to those questions over to Mr. De Berard, who was the expert statistician of the Merchants' Association, and you will find on page 643 of the hearings, Part III, this examination:

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask Mr. Peters some questions. I notice in the report made by the Merchants' Association of New York, on the first page, a lot of whereases, the first one of which says that it is shown by the analysis of the Interstate Commerce Commission that railroad revenues, as a whole, are insufficient and should be increased; and that the deficiency is mainly due to insufficient passenger-service earnings. Where is this analysis to be found of the Interstate Commerce Commission in which it sets forth the insufficiency of the pay?

Mr. PETERS. Can I ask Mr. De Berard, the director of research of the Merchants' Association of New York, to answer that? He is here.

Mr. MADDEN. Anybody; I do not care.

Mr. DE BERARD. That will be found in the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the matter of the application of the railroads for 5 per cent advance on all freight rates. The Interstate Commerce Commission, in that report, analyzed in sufficient detail the extent of the revenues of the railroads from all sources with reference to developing, if possible, whether or not the freight rates were sufficient. They made some analysis of the passenger rates in connection, and reached the conclusion, as stated in the report of the Merchants' Association, which is quoted in the supporting data in the following part of the report.

Mr. MADDEN. In reaching the conclusion that the passenger-traffic service was not profitable, did the Interstate Commerce Commission include in the passenger-traffic service the express traffic and the mail traffic as well?

Mr. DE BERARD. They included both.

Mr. MADDEN. So that, as a matter of fact, the analysis by the Interstate Commerce Commission is not an analysis of the passenger-traffic-service revenue at all?

Mr. DE BERARD. It is not an analysis in detail, for the reason that the commission——

Mr. MADDEN (interposing). No; just a moment. It is not a special analysis of the passenger-traffic service. It includes express traffic and mail traffic as well——

Mr. DE BERARD. Only it does not segregate the passenger service as a whole in these three elements. It treats it as a whole.

Then we go on. All this testimony is here printed in full. I asked him:

Have the railroads, in view of the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission reached a conclusion that the passenger-service revenues of the railroads of the United States are deficient, ever made application to the Interstate Commerce Commission for an increase in the passenger-service rate?

He said:

No. No application has ever been made.

Now, the question is, What relation have the passenger-service rates to the railway mail pay, and why do I talk about the passenger-service rates? It is for the reason that in the consideration of the question of the mail pay on the space basis it was concluded to investigate what the revenue from passenger service was, and it was clearly shown that the average gross revenue per car-mile for passenger movement on all the railroads of the United States was about 25 cents per car-mile.

Then the question arose, whether it was more expensive and more complicated to move a mail car than it is to move a passenger car, and whether in the movement of the mail we ought not to take into account the revenues derived from the passenger service. And it was concluded by the commission that it was not more expensive to move a mail car than a passenger car, because there were not so many incidental expenses connected with the movement of the mail car as there are with the movement of the passenger car. And so the conclusion was reached by the joint commission that the cost of moving the mail should be, measured by space, at about 10 per cent less than the cost of moving a passenger car per mile. But in the final conclusion reached the commission reported in favor of giving to the railroad companies practically the same revenue for moving mail by space that they received for moving passengers by space. That is the way they carry passengers—by space.

Now, they are being paid to-day on the ton basis, and here are the rates: They are paid $42.75 per mile per annum for carrying 200 pounds; on land-grant roads they are paid $34.20 per annum; and between 200 and 500 pounds the railroads are paid 85 cents per mile per annum on nonland-grant roads and 68 cents per mile per annum for every 12 pounds additional between 200 and 500 pounds. For every 500 pounds to-day the railroads get $64.12 per annum and $51.30 per annum per mile on the land-grant roads, and for all mail between 500 pounds and 1,000 pounds for every 20 pounds additional they get 85 cents and 68 cents per mile per annum extra.

For a thousand pounds of mail they get $85.50 per mile per annum and $68.40 per mile per annum over land-grant roads, and between 1,000 and 1,500 pounds of mail for additional 20 pounds they get the figures that I have just stated previously, 85 and 68 cents, and for every 1,500 pounds of mail they get $106.87 per mile per annum and $85.50 per mile per annum on land-grant roads, and between 1,500 and 2,000 pounds for every 20 additional pounds they get 85 cents per mile per annum and 68 cents on land-grant roads. For every 2,000 pounds they get $128.25 per annum and $102.60 on land-grant roads, and between 2,000 and 3,500 pounds for every additional 60 pounds they get 85 cents and 68 cents, depending on whether it is a land-grant road or not.

Then for 3,500 pounds flat they would get $149.62 per annum per mile and $119.70 on the land-grant roads, and between 3,500 pounds and 5,000 pounds they would get for every additional 60 pounds 85 cents and 68 cents. And then for 5,000 pounds they would get $171 per mile per annum, or $136.80 on land-grant roads; and for each additional 2,000 pounds above 5,000 pounds and less than 48,000 pounds they would get $20.30 and $16.24 over land-grant roads, and 85 cents and 68 cents for every additonal 80 pounds; and for each additional 2,000 pounds in excess of 48,000 pounds they would get $19.24 and $15.39 over land-grant roads. This is on the theory that the Government of the United States is in the wholesale business and that when the weight of the mail increases the price of transportation of that additional weight will decrease in proportion, as would the prices decrease to the wholesale purchaser as against the retail purchaser.

The average haul by the railroads of the mail of the United States is 620 miles, ranging according to the character of the mail. Some classes of mail travel more than 620 miles and some less, but the average is 620.

There are 1,411 railroad post-office cars in the United States. These cars to-day are paid for space as well as weight. They are what are called traveling railroad post-office cars, and the United States Government pays about $5,000,000 for those 1,411 railroad post-office cars, which would amount to $3,543.59 each.

Now, we pay this sum of $3,543.59 for each car in addition to the price we pay for the tonnage in the car. This is space. The cars cost all the way from $5,000 to $12,000 each. The railroad companies are obliged to light and heat and clean the cars. There are 4,000 apartment cars on the railroads of the United States in which mail is hauled and distributed, but for which no space payment is made. Mail hauled in baggage cars or apartment cars or storage cars is hauled by weight altogether and no space is paid for.

The railroads of the United States contend that they ought to be paid not only for the weight of the mail they haul, but that they ought to be paid for all the space in all the cars they haul besides. We contend that that is not just. We contend that if they are paid for the weight, they ought not to be paid for the space; that if they are paid for the space, they ought not to be paid for the weight; that there ought to be but one class of payment, and that that class of payment should be sufficiently compensatory to be just.

The aggregate pay under the plan that I have just described amounts to about $63,000,000 per annum, and it is at the rate of 9.17 cents per ton-mile without space payment. Add the $5,000,000, or the $3,543.59 per car, to the tonnage payment and you have 10.17 cents per ton-mile for every ton of mail hauled by the American railroads for the Government of the United States. The question is, Is that a fair compensation? To answer that question one would have to revert to the question of how much they get for the movement of other commodities.

The average ton-mile charge for freight, except first-class freight, in less than carload lots moved by fast freight, is less than seventy-one one-hundredths of a cent per ton-mile, and the average payment for fast freight in less than carload lots, on high-class commodities such as silks and all high-grade materials that have great value, and in connection with the movement of which great risk is incurred by the railroads, is from 3 to 4½ cents per ton-mile. Now, 10.17 cents per ton-mile for the movement of mail, though in fast trains, compares very favorably with the figures that I have just given, it seems to me.

I am frank to say that the railroad companies do not agree with the plan that we are proposing. They are afraid that if we adopt the space plan we are going to encourage the diversion of freight from their high-class freight movement to the storage-car movement in the mails. Why do I say that? They contend that whereas we are only hauling 7½ tons on an average in a storage car now, we can haul 20 tons, and that if we pay by space—and we are proposing to pay 21 cents a car-mile, and to pay a terminal charge of $8.50 for the round trip—we will compel them to carry mail in the storage car for 1¼ cents per ton-mile, and that the commodities which they are now carrying in the fast freight cars, yielding them from 3 to 4½ cents, will go in the storage car.

Of course it is not fair to assume that you can load the storage car with 20 tons of commodities. Why? In the first place, while the car has that capacity, but being a closed box car, if you were to send a carload of men's hats or women's hats, straw hats in boxes, and you loaded the car to its full capacity, I do not suppose you would have 2 tons of hats, because you could not put any more in the car. If they were sent by parcel post, you could not load any more into the car. I will confess to you that if you loaded the car with books, you might put 20 tons in the car. But it is not always possible to load compact material into one of these cars, and I presume it is safe to say that if you undertook to do it you would not get one car out of every hundred loaded to its capacity.

I do not blame the railroads for making every contention they can. They are engaged in a legitimate enterprise, and these men who advocate their case are experts. It is their business to get all they can for their companies for doing the work they do. They have got to pay dividends. They have to pay interest on their bonds. They have to pay the salaries of their men, and I would be the last man in the world to take away any part of the earning power of a railroad so as to make it impossible for them to give their men the compensation to which they are entitled. I would be the last man in the world to make it impossible for the railroads to maintain their tracks as they ought to be maintained. I would be the last man in the world to prevent a railroad from accumulating a legitimate surplus. I would be the last man in the world to prevent the railroads from protecting life and giving the kind of service that the country demands.

So I come to you, not as the enemy of the railroads in presenting this case, but as the friend of the railroads, and I give it as my deliberate judgment that the bill that we report and recommend for the movement of the mail by space is not only legitimate and just, but that it gives the railroad companies just compensation for the work they do and that it will not injure them in any way.

Now, the railroads contend that they want this whole subject matter referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission. They ask that the Interstate Commerce Commission be given the right to decide the question of what the rates shall be, not now, but for all time. The railroad companies want to take this question away from Congress, away from the Postmaster General, away from the Post Office Department, and they want to turn the mail business of the United States over to the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is what they contend for.

We are not opposing a review of this case by the Interstate Commerce Commission. On the contrary, we recommend it. We want the commission to review the rates. We confess that we are not the experts we would like to be, but we do claim we have made an honest effort to reach a just conclusion. We claim that we have given honest effort and study to the question on its merits; that we have tried to get the railroad companies to tell us what their figures are and what they ought to be. No man has been able yet to tell us. The question is, Have we any knowledge on the subject, and have we obtained that knowledge as the result of careful study? Are we prejudiced? If we are not, and if we have given to the question the consideration to which it is entitled, then we ought to be heard favorably. If we have not given to this question that consideration which its importance demands, and if we are proved to be prejudiced against the railroads, then we ought to be set aside and our report should be rejected. But if we have reached a conclusion, and if it is your deliberate judgment that that conclusion is reached as the result of honest effort, with a determination to do justice to everyone concerned, then I submit that having given careful consideration over a period of years to this question, you can safely follow the recommendation that we make. [Applause.]

Now, what is our recommendation? It is that we shall move the mail by space. What is space? We say that we want to move the mail under the following plan: To pay to the railroad companies 21 cents a car-mile for a full railroad post-office car, and $8.50 terminal charges for each round trip, $4.25 at each end of the route.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used one hour.

Mr. MADDEN. I will ask permission to conclude.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] seems to be absent temporarily, and I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois 30 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I will not take a very long time. We have recommended that for a 30-foot car there shall be paid to the railroads 11 cents a car-mile, and that shall be for the space and the contents; that for a 15-foot space in a car they shall be paid 6 cents a car-mile, for a 60-foot storage car 21 cents a car-mile, and for closed-pouch service we recommend the payment of 1½ cents a car-mile for a 3-foot space, and 3 cents a car-mile for a 7-foot space, with certain fixed terminal charges at each end of the line.

Mr. Chairman, there are 108,178,518 miles of 60-foot car units, which at 21 cents per car would amount to $22,717,489. The 30-foot cars run 168,530,856 miles per annum, based on last year's run, and at 11 cents would amount to $18,538,394. The 15-foot car would amount to 71,204,176 miles, and at 6 cents would aggregate $4,272,251; and a 60-foot storage car running 63,761,941 miles at 21 cents would amount to $13,390,007, or a total of $58,918,141, and pro rated into 60-foot car miles of 274,006,931 miles, so as to make a full car in the prorating, it would average 21.501 cents per car-mile.

The railway post office units, 60 feet, make 282,329 trips per annum one way, and the terminal charges on that each-way trip would be $4.25 for that number of trips, or $1,199,898. For a 30-foot car there would be 911,004 trips one-way run, at $2.75, which would be $2,505,261. A 15-foot car, 926,582 trips, at $2 a car, amounting to $1,853,164, and the 60-foot storage would run 120,435 one-way trips, at $4.25 terminal charges, making $511,849, making a total of $6,070,172 for terminal charges. So that that would make the total line charge, including the 21 cents a car-mile and the terminal charges, $64,988,313, or 23.717 cents per car-mile. The closed pouch, based on train per cent of weight, would give us $4,802,766, and prorated into 60-foot car-miles, including the closed pouch, we have 281,733,926 full car-miles per annum; and the amount of the payment would be $69,791,079. Deducting for land grant 20 per cent of the payment, it would amount to $1,339,989, leaving a balance of $68,451,090; and it would make the line charge per car-mile, including the terminal charges, 24.296 cents per car-mile, whereas the average railroad earning from the passenger service is less than 25 cents per car mile. So that when we come to make up this bill we are reaching the passenger car-mile pay for the movement of the mail. Then if we add the cost of the blue-tag service, which is magazines and that sort of mail that goes by freight, on which we just attach a blue tag to make it reach its destination, we have $800,000 more, making the total pay under the so-called Moon bill of $69,251,090, as compared with $63,000,000 under the present plan of moving the mail, or a difference of $6,000,000 per annum.

Under the present compensation the railroads are getting 10.17 cents per ton-mile. There is $6,000,000 difference between the pay under the proposed bill and under the present law, and if we move 281,733,926 car-miles per annum, you see, the difference between the $63,000,000 and the $69,000,000 would make 2 cents a ton-mile more, thus giving to the railroads under the Moon bill, so called, not 10.17 cents per ton-mile, but 12.17 cents per ton-mile; so that we are not doing any damage to the railroads. If, however, the Postmaster General should increase the weight of the parcel post from 50 pounds to 100 pounds, I am free to confess that it is just possible that it would divert some of this high-class freight business into the parcel post, and I do not believe that would be justified; but on the present weight of the parcel post—50 pounds—we are not going to do any damage to the railroads—and I do not want to see any damage done to the railroads, for they are an instrumentality in America's life that ought to be encouraged and sustained in every legitimate way. They are not entitled to any more than decent consideration; but they are entitled to that, and they ought to have it, and I would be the last man—and I know there is no man in this House—who would do them an injustice; and the American people do not want any injustice done to them. We are here to speak for the American people and the railroad companies—or those who own them are part of the American people—but I do believe that we ought not to reach our conclusions as a result of arguments of men who are paid to advocate given things. Why? In the first place, the railroad companies want more for moving the mails, and then other people want more compensation for the work they do; and there is still a very respectable class—a not inconsiderable number in the United States—who want to reduce the present postage rates; and between the men who are interested in the different things, who want to increase the compensation for the things they do and the people who want to decrease the amount they pay into the Treasury in the way of postal rates, if we grant them all we will not have any Post Office Department, and we will be compelled to levy new taxes and collect revenue from some other sources to meet the running expenses of the Post Office Department; and that, I say deliberately, is unjustifiable. [Applause.]

What do the railroad companies say? They say they want to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission. What have we done? We have done just what they wanted, but not in the way they want it. How do they want it? They want it to be turned over to the Interstate Commerce Commission, regardless of Congress or the Postmaster General, now and forever more. We maintain that this is a postal facility, that the Constitution of the United States gives the Congress the right to establish post offices and post roads, and, recognizing this authority, the Congress years ago passed a law giving the Post Office Department the monopoly of moving the mails and giving that department the authority to fix the rates under the law, and we are working under that law now, and we ought not to yield our rights to that monopoly by turning over its control and regulation to some department that has no technical knowledge of the conduct of the affairs of this great institution. But we have done this. We have sent the question up to the Interstate Commerce Commission, but not exactly in the way the railroads want it sent. The railroads wanted us to send the question to the Interstate Commerce Commission now and let them operate under current rates while the Interstate Commerce Commission is considering the question. In fact, they did not suggest we ever take it away from the Interstate Commerce Commission, but we have said we would give them the right to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission immediately after the adoption of these rates. Now, if the rates are wrong, they can be rectified. What is the language of the authority we give to the Interstate Commerce Commission? What is the authority to the railroad companies under that language? We say this. Here it is:

After the rates specified in this act shall have been adopted, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall, whenever requested by the Postmaster General or by the representatives of railroads with an aggregate mileage of at least 51 per cent of the mileage of railroads carrying mail, make an investigation of the justice and reasonableness of rates then in effect, grant hearings to parties in interest, and report to Congress at the earliest practicable date thereafter the results of such investigation, making specific findings as to whether the rates fixed herein should be increased or decreased, and if either, how much. Such report shall show for each steam railroad operating company, if practicable, the amount of mail service rendered, the cost of performing same, and a comparison of the earnings of such railroad company from the mail traffic with those from express traffic and other passenger-train traffic. For the purpose of such investigations the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have all powers which it is now authorized to exercise in the investigation of the reasonableness of rates, and the Postmaster General shall supply such information regarding the mail service as may be requested by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I submit to the judgment of the House that with this provision of the bill, giving the right to the Interstate Commerce Commission to review the rates and to recommend either an increase or a decrease to the Congress, that the rights of the railroads are properly protected and safeguarded and that no injustice is being done to them. And I submit further that in the face of the fact that this bill upon its face provides for the payment of 2 cents per ton-mile more than they are already receiving, the railroad companies are being, when this bill is enacted, compensated for every dollar's worth of service they render to the Government of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Will my colleague yield to me for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. I will yield.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask my colleague one or two brief questions simply to emphasize a point. If I understood my colleague, he stated that the railroad companies were cognizant of this schedule of rates which he has just read to us this afternoon?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. And that the railroad companies when asked to give what they believed would be a fair schedule of rates declined to file any schedule?

Mr. MADDEN. They do not know what it costs, they say.

Mr. McKENZIE. At any rate, they did not file any schedule.

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that in the gentleman's judgment the railroad companies are not so particularly interested in this schedule of rates as they are in the system which is to be adopted?

Mr. MADDEN. I presume they are opposed to the system, and that that is the only thing. They say that distinctly.

Mr. McKENZIE. Now, is the reason for their opposition, in the gentleman's judgment, due to the fact that there is a possibility they may in the future lose some of this high-class freight which the gentleman has mentioned this afternoon?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, undoubtedly.

Mr. SIMS. Do they assign that as the real reason?

Mr. MADDEN. That is the only reason.

Mr. SIMS. That is the only possibility assigned that they will lose. In other words, they will get more under this new system than they possibly can under this——

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee, in explanation of what I have already said, there is only one division in this service where it is possible to have any freight diversion, and that is in the storage car. The storage-car movement amounts, more or less, to 20 per cent of all the mileage, and it would not be under any circumstances, in my judgment, possible for more than 20 per cent of that 20 per cent under the most adverse conditions to be diverted. That is, supposing they had a storage-car movement of 20 per cent, making about $12,000,000, if 20 per cent of that $12,000,000 is diverted, it would only amount to $2,400,000, and the railroads would still have $3,600,000 more compensation under this bill than they have under the present law, even under the worst thing that could happen.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. OGLESBY. I understood the gentleman to say that the passenger rates are 25 cents per car-mile.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. OGLESBY. And under this bill they would receive on space the same?

Mr. MADDEN. 24.296 cents.

Mr. OGLESBY. Is it not a fact the railroads themselves fix their passenger rates?

Mr. MADDEN. The railroad companies in some cases claim, although they did not claim it to us, that they do not fix the passenger rates, but they claim that the State legislatures fix them, and when they were asked whether they had ever made application to the Interstate Commerce Commission for an increase in the passenger rates they replied they had not.

Mr. GARLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. GARLAND. The gentleman made a statement of existing possibilities of change of conditions as provided in the law. Does that apply also to the weight plan as it does to the space plan?

Mr. MADDEN. The bill recommends the space plan, and we are operating now under the weight plan.

Mr. GARLAND. The roads are now in operation under the weight plan. Now, does that apply to the new plan in reference to space?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not quite catch the gentleman's point.

Mr. GARLAND. The same law would not apply.

Mr. MADDEN. No; there would be no weight whatever under the space plan.

Mr. GARLAND. The reason I ask this is that I read a pamphlet gotten out by some one, entitled "Space versus Weight," and I find that they do not advise any change, that they will still have to use weight.

Mr. MADDEN. No weight whatever.

Mr. GARLAND. Not in less than carload lots?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no. That is all space.

Mr. GARLAND. Well, the pamphlet so states.

Mr. MADDEN. The man who wrote it does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. GARLAND. I wanted to get the expression of the committee on the subject, because I want to vote intelligently on it. The provision here is as to the possibility of changing the weight plan over to the space plan, and I would like to know about it so that I can vote correctly.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not quite catch the question; but I say, if by any chance it is possible for them to divert any part of it, to overload a storage car and carry a greater weight than they carry now, it could not under any circumstances affect more than 20 per cent of the storage-car mileage, which is 20 per cent of the total mileage.

Mr. GARLAND. I see your point.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Why does the committee object to the reference of a fair compensation for carrying the mails to what might be supposed to be an intelligent third party, the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. MADDEN. We have not objected. We have referred it to them.

Mr. HILL. I know you have; but you have referred it to them without any power, and you simply require them to make a report back to you, you still holding the power to decide the question for yourselves as to the terms under which the mails are carried and the rate which shall be paid for it. What objection is there to leaving it to an independent third party, especially when that party is the representative of the Government itself?

Mr. MADDEN. We think we are just as competent to decide that question, speaking for all the people, as the Interstate Commerce Commission is, which speaks only for freight rates on the railroads. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL. If that is true, why leave it to them at all?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, because we want to give evidence of our fairness.

Mr. HILL. I do not think it gives any evidence of fairness, if you do not give them any power to decide the case.

Mr. MADDEN. We give it to the representatives of the American people. Now, the question is, Will the representatives of the American people act fairly?

Mr. HILL. That is the question. Why not leave it to the third party to decide?

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman have any hope, as a representative of the American people, that the Interstate Commerce Commission would recognize an increase in the compensation? Does the gentleman doubt any gentleman of this House having equal integrity with himself?

Mr. HILL. Why should the buyer reserve to himself the cost of the goods he is going to buy and determine all the factors in the case, where there is a Government agency that determines that with reference to all other questions?

Mr. MADDEN. No such case entered into the factors the gentleman refers to, and the Post Office Department having by law the monopoly of the mails, ought to retain that monopoly of the mails, and not turn the jurisdiction of them over to any rate-making body that has jurisdiction simply over the railroads.

Mr. HILL. I agree absolutely with the gentleman, but let me ask him one more question. Having the monopoly, ought they not to be willing to leave it to the justice of a coordinate branch of the Government?

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to say to the gentleman, in reply to the last question, that I maintain that no body of men ever acted more justly than the body of men that reported this bill to the House and recommend this bill to the consideration of the House, with the conscientious belief that we were doing in this matter what we would expect done to us if we were on the other side of the case.

Mr. HILL. Nobody doubts that.

Mr. BENNET. You spoke of what was called the Cassidy ring?

Mr. MADDEN. I did not mention the name.

Mr. BENNET. That was the name in the hearings. Did the gentleman intend to convey the impression that the persons convicted were connected with surety companies?

Mr. MADDEN. They had a combination with insurance companies by means of which they were able to bid to the exclusion of other people, and they had representatives of insurance companies before the Post Office Department speaking for them to the exclusion of everybody else, and we thought that was sufficient scandal and smelled bad enough to require us to do something to remedy it.

Mr. BENNET. Is it not a fact that no official of a surety company was indicted at all?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no; they were not indicted. They were not in conspiracy.

Mr. BENNET. Is it not a further fact——

Mr. MADDEN. And I did not make that statement, either.

Mr. BENNET. I know the gentleman did not. I think he rather made the implication.

Mr. MADDEN. I did not mean to do any injustice to anybody.

Mr. BENNET. Is it not a fact that while there are 40 surety companies qualified to do this sort of business the criticism as it appears in the hearing applies to but one, and that company a company located in my city, which had a representative here in Washington?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I think that is true, except as to this: All of the insurance companies, while not directly connected with this particular case—there being only one, and the one that the gentleman refers to that had that connection—it was proved that all the companies, every one of them, had a rate-making arrangement with the so-called Towner Bureau, of New York, that gave evidence to the committee that the rates were fixed through the instrumentality of Mr. Towner. He was the agent of the pool, so to speak.

Mr. BENNET. Is not the gentleman aware, if he will permit me one more question——

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. That of the 40 qualified surety companies, fewer than 20 are in the Towner rate-making association?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know; I will say to the gentleman. I have no prejudice against any one of them.

Mr. BENNET. I just wanted to make the point clear, in justice to the other surety companies.

Mr. MADDEN. I wanted to say to the gentleman that I have no prejudice at all, except that I wanted to clear up what I think was a scandal.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me one more question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. The provision in the bill relative to the surety companies is not the provision that was recommended by the department?

Mr. MADDEN. No. It has been materially modified.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not the position of the committee that, in regard to this question of railroad rate making and the power of Congress, the gentleman believes the same position or relation ought to exist between the Congress and the Interstate Commerce Commission with regard to this matter as would exist between a tariff commission and Congress?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. And would it not be pertinent to ask the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] whether or not he would be willing to divest Congress entirely of the power of legislating regarding the tariff and turn it entirely over to the tariff commission? [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. No, no; Mr. Chairman, because of the Constitution. [Laughter.] It is very easy to ask the question if it is assumed that your question is based upon a correct understanding of the facts. The Constitution of the United States distinctly provides that all revenue questions or revenue legislation shall originate with the House of Representatives, and they have no power to delegate that function; they have no right to delegate that power. But this is a question, as it strikes me, where practically the House of Representatives has a right to make an appropriation to authorize the department to buy certain things, but it does not prescribe the rates which the State Department or the other departments shall pay for paper and string and all the other paraphernalia with which they carry on their offices. It provides that we should appropriate for an amount, and justice and reason should say that some third party should fix the prices.

Mr. MADDEN. I thank the House for its great courtesy to me and beg to apologize for taking so much of its time. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I have been a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads for the past six years. During that period of time, as a member of the committee, I have served with men as its chairman of my own political faith and with men of the opposing political faith.

I believe this is one of the best and cleanest Post Office appropriation bills that has come before the floor of this House for the past six or eight years. [Applause.] In the main, in our committee room politics in no way or manner enters into our investigations, and in the main I do not believe that politics has or should have any place or part in the administration of this great affair. It had not been my intention to discuss politics at all. I had made up my mind to refrain from even mentioning it. But on account of the fact that my esteemed friend the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] yesterday saw fit to criticize the present administration of the Post Office Department, in a few brief words I feel constrained to say something along that line.

But before I enter upon that I wish to compliment the gentleman from the city of Chicago, Hon. Mr. MADDEN, a member of our committee. I doubt if upon the floor of this House or in any committee room or before any commission there has ever been presented such a masterful construction and presentation of the question of railway mail pay as he has presented to-day. [Applause.] I doubt, and I doubt seriously, when this bill goes to the other end of the Capitol, where no doubt the question will be raised fiercely by the railroads upon one side and the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads on the other, whether the railroads will ever be able to get away from his absolutely indisputable figures.

Like the gentleman from Illinois, I would be the last man who would willingly or knowingly do the railroads an injustice. But the time has come—it is now here—when this ever-vexatious question should be settled, and settled right. Let it be said to the credit of ex-Postmaster General Hitchcock that he was the first man who really started this move. From 1878 to 1909 there was an old statute upon the books, which down to that hour had been absolutely dormant and which gave to the Postmaster General the power to compel the railroads to furnish the Post Office Department with data showing the total cost borne by the railroads in the carrying of the mails.

It was in 1909 that Postmaster General Hitchcock asked Congress for an appropriation to compel the railroads to submit to the Congress of the United States a statement of the cost to them of the transportation of the mails. Six years ago the fight started. It has never stopped; it has never ceased; it never will stop until this question is settled, and settled right.

The present system of paying railroads is old, antiquated, out of date, unbusinesslike. The proposed system is a modern, up-to-date business proposition. Anyone who will read the postal laws from 1872 down to 1907 will quickly observe that Congress during that long period of time and the Post Office Department upon the one side and the railroads upon the other were involved in a constant, interminable fight and struggle as to how much the railroads should be paid for the transportation of the mails. At last, as the result of exhaustive work before committees of Congress, before commissions established by Congress, we have got this proposition down upon a tangible, intelligent, scientific basis.

On yesterday evening my friend from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] saw fit to criticize the Postmaster General upon various grounds and for various reasons.

He said that the Postmaster General was in error when he stated that at the close of the Hitchcock administration there was a deficit, because he said that in fact there was a surplus in the Post Office Department at the close of the Hitchcock administration.

I do not care very much about a deficit or a surplus in the Post Office Department. I recognize that it is next to a physical impossibility to run the Post Office Department as a great private enterprise would run private business. Sometimes the postal receipts will show a surplus and sometimes they will show a deficit. These conditions may be brought about and may be due to different and diverse facts. Exercising the sagacity of a good business man endeavoring to take an inventory of the situation to see where he was standing, the present Postmaster General, soon after he took his office, appointed a committee to investigate the postal affairs for the four preceding years. That committee was composed of some of the ablest men connected with the department—Hons. Daniel C. Roper, Joseph Stewart, A. M. Dockery, James I. Blakslee, and M. O. Chance. Two of these men had been in the employ of Mr. Hitchcock. One of them was his Second Assistant Postmaster General for four years. Mr. Chance had been for a few years his chief clerk and had later been taken by Mr. Taft and placed upon his Economy Commission.

These men reported to the present Postmaster General early in the fall of 1913 that instead of there being a surplus at the close of Mr. Taft's administration there was, in fact, a deficit of $750,000, as shown by the report of this committee, which is as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 7, 1913.

Hon. A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

SIR: Your committee, appointed by Order 6933, dated March 19, 1913, to investigate and report the financial, physical, and working conditions throughout the department and the Postal Service with relation to June 30, 1912, and March 4, 1913, has the honor to submit its report herewith.

A very thorough inquiry has been made during which all available data in the department have been examined (see exhibits attached) and postmasters from important cities, inspectors, officials of the Railway Mail Service, and others have been consulted, from which your committee has assembled the following facts, conclusions, and recommendations:

POLICIES OF THE PREVIOUS ADMINISTRATION.

The all-absorbing program of the last administration was the placing of the Post Office Department on a paying basis. The policies pursued in the effort to succeed in this plan were overworked and resulted in defective administration and just criticism on the part of the public. That efficiency and economy should be substituted for wastefulness and extravagance needs no argument, but the Postal Service affects so vitally the interests of the entire population of the country that economy which means a curtailment of postal facilities operates as a check to the social and industrial progress of the country. The people are entitled to the best facilities administered in the most efficient manner. That the facilities furnished during the last four years were not the best is clearly established by the facts.

METHOD OF ACCOUNTING.

Notwithstanding the great zeal displayed in the effort to place the department on the so-called paying basis and the resultant injuries to the service, the claim of the former Postmaster General that the service actually yielded a profit in 1911 has no foundation in fact as is shown herein.

It is to be further noted that the balance sheet as heretofore prepared concerned itself entirely with the revenues from postage and the operations of the department and expenditures under the appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department. In addition to this the department should be able to make a complete statement of its financial status, which should include the administrative expenses of the department, the expenses of the auditor's office, and a fair charge for the maintenance of Federal buildings used exclusively or in part for post-office purposes as items of cost. It has not been the custom to include these in the balance sheet. Furthermore, due credit should be given the department for the service performed in handling and carrying franked and penalty mails.

DEPARTMENTAL SERVICE.

In line with the policy of unwise administrative economy which the former administration had adopted, vacancies in the clerical force of the department were permitted to remain unfilled, and the lapsed salaries were turned back to the Treasury. The withholding of deserved promotions caused dissatisfaction among the employees, and undoubtedly, to some extent, lowered their efficiency and contributed against keeping current the work of the department.

The failure to fill vacancies in the department in the latter part of 1910 and during 1911 was not justified. Instead of making deserving promotions, a considerable number of transfers from other departments were made, at salaries in excess of the entrance grade, of men untrained in the work of the Post Office Department.

In order to effect these transfers the Postmaster General certified in each case where the transfer was at a salary in excess of the entrance grade that the person recommended for transfer was specially equipped for the work to which it was intended to assign him, and that the vacant position could not be adequately filled by promotion. Many of these certifications were unjustified

The records show that during the four years from March 4, 1909, to March 4, 1913, vacancies which were allowed to exist for periods ranging from one month to more than one year aggregated the equivalent of 34 clerks employed continuously during the above period.

REVERSAL OF POLICIES.

It is interesting to note that immediately before March 4, 1913, there was a complete reversal of economic policies. In the department all available places that had remained vacant for months were filled.

On January 21, 1913, urgent verbal instructions were given by the Postmaster General to report for immediate final action every possible favorably approved rural route, and, acting under these instructions, over 100 rural mail-delivery establishments were authorized in three days. Directions were given to expedite as much as possible inspectors' reports on all cases then under investigation of rural delivery and of allowances, with instructions for favorable reports.

POST OFFICE SERVICE.

In the endeavor of the former Postmaster General to wipe out the deficit, it is evident from the examination by your committee of the internal and external working conditions of the department and the service that his constant efforts in exhorting postmasters and others connected with the service on the sole theme of cutting down expenses had a tendency to impair the service.

Immediately upon assuming office Postmaster General Hitchcock sent broadcast the announcement that economy would be the watchword of the administration. Notices to this effect were carried by the press, delivered personally by representatives of the department at postmasters' conventions, and in official letters to postmasters at first and second class post offices they were requested to exert every effort in the interest of utmost economy. Copies of some of these letters are attached to this report. It is believed that many postmasters in their zeal to carry out the wishes of the Postmaster General and to make records which they thought would be regarded favorably have extended their efforts beyond the proper limit and have more likely effected retrenchment than economy in the administration of the Postal Service. Repeated requests for closer cooperation in the matter of economy unquestionably influenced postmasters in numerous instances to curtail service where this could be done without too great complaint from the public and to withhold until the last possible moment requests for necessary additional help in the clerical and carrier forces and for allowances for other purposes. This practice has worked to the detriment of the service generally, and while it would be difficult in so large a service to point out specific instances in great numbers, the result has undoubtedly justified such complaints of imperfect and unsatisfactory service as have been received recently from New York, Philadelphia, and elsewhere. All such complaints are now receiving careful attention.

During the early part of the administration action was deferred on all cases involving the establishment of city delivery service in which there might be any excuse for delaying action, notwithstanding that the people were entitled to this service and its establishment had been recommended by post-office inspectors. Many such cases were acted upon only after persistent requests of Senators and Representatives.

Another practice of deferring action was that of referring requests from postmasters for additional clerks and carriers to inspectors for investigation before taking action thereon. It is safe to say that these requests were made in most cases only when the additional help had become absolutely necessary, especially in view of the Postmaster General's repeated injunction in regard to economy. While the investigations as to the real necessity for additional help were being conducted, temporary help, as a rule, was not granted, and frequently months elapsed between the receipt of the postmaster's request at the department and the completion of the inspector's investigation. Reorganizations worked out by the inspectors with a view to minimizing the additional help required were seldom in harmony with the postmaster's views, and as a consequence further time would be lost, and where additional help was actually needed the service would continue to suffer until the facts could be determined. It should not be assumed that these reorganizations were without value, for in many instances they have brought certain betterments to the service. The point is, however, that this practice served to further discourage postmasters from making applications for necessary help and extensions of the service, because the investigations sometimes brought to light the fact that the postmaster's knowledge of the work and his progressiveness were not of the best. It should be said that since June, 1911, the practice has been changed to the extent of allowing temporary assistance pending these investigations by inspectors.

The practice of delaying action until the pressure for it became too strong is even more noticeable by an examination of the records of the Division of Rural Mails. During the greater part of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911, rural routes were apparently established only in cases of extreme emergency, except where a net saving to the Government was involved. Practically no extensions of existing routes were approved. On October 1, 1910, 1,184 approved petitions for rural-route establishments were held in the Division of Rural Mails awaiting final action. These continued to accumulate, and yet at the end of May following (May, 1911) the record for the 11 months of the fiscal year shows a net increase of only 210 routes. In the single month of June, 1911, 375 routes were established and 8 discontinued, making a net increase of 367 for the one month, or a net total for the year of 577 routes. The annual cost during the fiscal year for this increase of 577 routes was thus limited to $210,437, or fifty-seventh one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the annual appropriation.

In October, 1910, the Fourth Assistant's Bureau apparently faced a deficit on account of the star-route service, and instructions were issued to reduce the expenditures for existing service to such a figure as would avoid a deficit. The attention of Congress was not called to this condition and star-route service was discontinued or curtailed, and proposed additional service was not established. Protests and demands for restoration were so urgent and insistent, however, that in the early part of May, 1911, nearly all of the star-route service previously discontinued or curtailed was restored, effective June 1, 1911. These discontinuances and curtailments effected a saving or decrease of nearly $100,000 in the expenditures for star-route service during 1911.

FINANCIAL CONDITIONS.

Under the direction of the Third Assistant Postmaster General a comprehensive study has been made of the financial condition of the Post Office Department for the fiscal years 1909 to 1912, inclusive. The accounting methods used are described in detail and careful analysis presented of the balances reported for each fiscal year, particular attention being given to the alleged surplus of 1911. Instead of a surplus of $219,118.12 for that year, as claimed by your predecessor, it is clearly demonstrated that there was in reality a deficit of more than three-quarters of a million dollars. Furthermore, a close analysis of the financial statement for the fiscal year 1912 discloses the fact that the admitted deficit of $1,785,523.10 for that year was understated by nearly $100,000. A concise summary of this financial report, together with the detailed tabular statements, are submitted as a special exhibit.

PHYSICAL CONDITIONS.

DEPARTMENTAL QUARTERS.

While, in the main, it is probable that the Post Office Department quarters are as satisfactory as those occupied by other executive departments in Washington, it is noticeable that there are divisions or parts of divisions of each of the four bureaus where the space is entirely inadequate, the location of the rooms inconvenient for proper cooperative work with other branches of the same bureau, and where the light, ventilation, and sanitary conditions are a menace to the health and comfort of the employees. Numerous specific instances are brought to the committee's attention of rooms approximately 18 by 20 feet and with one window, occupied by six clerks, and of rooms approximately 22 by 20 feet, with one window, occupied by eight clerks. With the necessary desks, file cases, and other furniture and equipment for the use of this number of persons, it is easily seen that in rooms the size indicated the most efficient operations are impossible. Files which have to be referred to continuously are stored in dark and inaccessible rooms, many of them on the top floor of the building where there is neither sufficient light nor ventilation and where the cleaners seldom find their way.

By careful study of these conditions certain betterments will be brought about.

ASSIGNMENT OF SPACE TO THE SEVERAL BUREAUS.

It is noted that in the assignment of rooms to the different bureaus of the department serious inconvenience has resulted in many instances by the separation of the workrooms of important divisions from the main post-office building and their location in other parts of the city, in some cases at a considerable distance; also by the separation by several floors of divisions from the headquarters of the bureau in the same building. One division of the Second Assistant's office occupies rooms at Tenth and G Streets and one is located in the annex at First and K Streets NE.; two divisions of the Third Assistant's office occupy a building at First and K Streets NE., directly adjoining the railroad viaduct, where the noise and smoke from the constantly moving trains is a serious handicap to the work of the divisions; and two divisions of the Fourth Assistant's office also occupy a room in the annex at First and K Streets. This separation not only renders perfect supervision by the head of the bureau impossible, but necessarily retards the work to a considerable extent when action is dependent on personal exchange of views between the head of the bureau and his supervising officer, located at this distant point. The same is true, to a lesser degree, where the different divisions of a bureau are located on different floors in the main building. In the case of the Third Assistant Postmaster General's bureau many of the current files have to be kept on the ninth floor, thus causing a considerable loss of time of the clerks whenever a search into these files is required.

As long as it is necessary to rent outside buildings in the city in which to house a part of the department's force, particular care should be exercised to select for assignment to such outside buildings divisions or offices that have the least connection with other divisions or offices, and thus inconvenience as little as possible the general operations of the department.

The office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department, which is under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department, occupies a considerable part of the Post Office Building. If the plan were carried out, as proposed several years ago, of erecting an office building for the auditor's use on the square south of the Post Office Building, which was purchased by the Government for that express purpose, it would relieve very greatly the present congested conditions. Some relief will be afforded when the new post office building near the Union Station is completed.

This matter of reassignment of space should receive prompt attention.

OFFICE FURNITURE AND EQUIPMENT.

Much of the furniture now in use throughout the department is unsuited to its purpose and insanitary. A few offices have received attention in this respect and during the last administration were newly furnished and equipped with modern furniture and fixtures, while others were neglected and little consideration given to requisitions of bureau officers.

WORKING CONDITIONS.

DEPARTMENTAL ORGANIZATION.

Legislative action from time to time has necessitated changes in the assignment of duties to the several bureaus of the department. Changes in business methods have suggested also certain reassignments that could be effected by order of the Postmaster General. The present organization, however, should be made the subject of special study, with a view to effecting a more logical distribution for bureau administration than now exists of the different features of postal activity. To accomplish this in its entirety congressional action is necessary.

POSTAL SAVINGS SYSTEM.

The Postal Savings System is so closely identified with other financial branches of the service, which are now assigned to the bureau of the Third Assistant Postmaster General, that it is believed that this work could be more effectively and more economically administered if it were placed under the supervision of the Third Assistant Postmaster General and the head of the system designated as superintendent, division of postal savings depositories, and this action is recommended.

POST-OFFICE SITES.

One of the most important changes which the present administration should endeavor to effect is in the method of selecting the sites of Federal buildings intended for post-office purposes. Unquestionably this department is better qualified than the Treasury Department to determine the proper location of these buildings. In many instances sites have been chosen for post-office buildings without due regard to the requirements of the service, the proper administration of the postal facilities, or the convenience to the commercial interests of the respective cities. In numerous cities by reason of the inappropriate location of the Federal buildings the Post Office Department finds it necessary to maintain an expensive station at the logical point for the main post office and a greater volume of business is done at some of these stations than at the main office. This condition adds materially to the aggregate cost of the service. This matter should be given prompt attention and authority obtained from Congress permitting the selection of these sites by the Post Office Department.

SUNDAY SERVICE AT POST OFFICES.

It is believed that the question of closing post offices on Sunday has not received the careful consideration which the importance of this matter merits. The Post Office appropriation act which became effective August 24, 1912, contained a provision not recommended or suggested by the department prohibiting the opening of post offices of the first and second classes on Sunday for the purpose of delivering mail to the general public. A literal interpretation of this paragraph would prevent a patron from receiving any mail at offices where no transit mail is handled and none dispatched on Sunday, no matter how important. At offices where mails are dispatched on Sunday or the office is open for handling transit mail, the postmaster is not prohibited from accommodating the patrons in the delivery of their mail to the extent that the necessary employees required to be on duty can be allowed compensatory time off on some day during the succeeding week. No uniform practice, however, is followed throughout the service in this regard and the compiaints of persons who have had excellent reasons for getting important mail on Sunday and have been denied that privilege are undoubtedly justified. While the principle of reducing to the minimum the work required of postal employees on Sunday is undoubtedly a proper one, it is of vital interest frequently that important mail matter be delivered to the addressee on Sunday. When the apparent necessity for it is made known, the public should be accommodated as far as possible. Moreover, it is a serious question whether the business interests in important commercial cities do not demand that the mails received on Sunday be not allowed to accumulate unduly, which undoubtedly affects their prompt delivery on the following day. Such a condition is almost certain to result from the complete closing of post offices on Sunday. It is recommended that this question receive the early attention of this administration.

BACKSTAMPING OF LETTER MAIL.

Section 611 of the Postal Laws and Regulations requires incoming letter mail to be backstamped with the date of receipt at a post office. Except in the case of registered and special-delivery mail, it is not believed that this practice serves any useful purpose. Certainly the benefits derived from the practice in offices of any size are not commensurate with the time and labor involved. In 1908 or thereabouts the Postmaster General suspended the regulation experimentally at a number of the larger post offices. The number of offices has been added to from time to time, until there are now approximately 500 where this service is not performed. The public desires most of all the expeditious delivery of their mail. It has been found in numerous instances that by discontinuing backstamping the early morning deliveries could be advanced materially.

Furthermore the discontinuance of this practice in large offices has resulted in a considerable saving. According to a report on file, to resume the service at the New York post office would require 40 additional clerks and 20 high-power canceling machines, which would mean an expense of more than $35,000 annually for that office alone. Even in the small country offices it would mean a saving of time to the patrons who crowd into the lobby of the post office upon the arrival of the mail train and await the opening of the delivery window.

It is recommended that the regulations be amended by an order of the Postmaster General suspending at all post offices the backstamping of mail, except that which is registered or is intended for special delivery.

PARCEL POST.

In view of the enormous and steadily increasing volume of parcel-post mail handled since the inauguration of this service on January 1 last, this new extension of the service demands the immediate and earnest attention of this administration in order to insure the expeditious handling of these mails, especially in the larger cities, and the best and most economical methods of handling them in the railway post offices and en route.

The conditions of the service should be ascertained as soon as practicable in order that it may be determined whether the parcel-post rates may be safely reduced or changes in the present zones made.

MODEL POST-OFFICE SERVICE.

The study of conditions in post offices for the best method of handling parcel-post matter should extend to the handling of other classes of mail matter and to the general post-office conditions, in order that the department may determine just where the methods and conditions are of the best, and thus be used as models. Such information would be of immense value in the administration of the service. It is recommended that a committee of the department's best postal experts be appointed without delay to visit a number of representative post offices of each class for the purpose of ascertaining the various methods pursued with reference to the handling of parcel-post matter and also as to other branches of the work, and thus by comparison enable the department to adopt the best under each set of conditions.

PARCEL-POST STAMPS.

The distinctive stamps required by the parcel-post law for use on parcel-post mail matter serve no useful purpose, except possibly to determine more readily the amount of revenue from this particular branch of the service. This could be determined in some other way. Their discontinuance would save the public much annoyance and embarrassment and also effect a considerable saving in expense to the Government. Ordinary postage stamps should be sufficiently elastic for every postage purpose.

EQUALIZATION OF SALARIES.

Even the cursory survey made by your committee has disclosed the fact that marked inequalities in salaries exist throughout the department. Wide variations are found in the salaries paid clerks who are performing identical or very similar services, and in many instances employees engaged in work requiring exceptional skill are receiving less compensation than others whose duties are comparatively simple. It is urgently recommended that these conditions be thoroughly investigated, with a view to the establishment of an equitable scheme for standardization of work. Wherever the character of work permits of the adoption of fixed standards of quantity and quality the salaries paid should be regulated by the variations from such standards. It is further recommended that careful consideration be given to the compensation of the officers of the department, as it is believed that the salaries fixed by law do not in all instances bear a proper relation to the duties and responsibilities of these positions.

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

Exhibit "B," upon the subject of the Railway Mail Service and the policy adopted by the former Postmaster General in relation to its reorganization and conduct, shows to what extent the policy resulted in impairment to the efficiency of the service. Economies which went beyond the requirements of good administration reduced the service to the minimum, leaving it unable to respond to normal changes. Besides the fact that the policy and method produced a widespread discontent and suspicion in the personnel of the service, materially affecting the esprit de corps, it left the service at the end of the administration in poor condition to handle the normal increase in business and the large demands made upon it by the inauguration of parcel post, thus throwing upon the new administration the burden of restoring proper conditions at an unusual amount of expenditure. Since the advent of the present administration much has been done to improve the service and place it in the best condition, and these efforts are being continued.

BONDS OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

The postal service of Canada adopted some years ago a plan for bonding its employees which from all reports has proven very satisfactory to the Canadian Government, besides costing the employees considerably less than the employees in the United States service are required to pay on bonds of equal amount. It is recommended that this matter be looked into.

PERFORMANCE OF DUTIES BY POSTMASTERS.

Too little attention has been given to the question whether postmasters at presidential offices were devoting sufficient time to their offices and were personally performing any of the duties. Aside from the periodical inspections of post offices by post-office inspectors, no effort seems to have been made to ascertain these facts; and even when reports of inspectors have disclosed that a postmaster was devoting a few hours only to his office, that he give it only perfunctory supervision, and that his lack of knowledge as to postal matters was such as to reflect discredit upon the department, no action appears to have been taken unless outside influences were brought to bear in the case.

The salaries of presidential postmasters, as a rule, are commensurate with the duties and responsibilities of the respective offices, and these officers should be required to give a fair return for the compensation paid them. If the postmaster, who is the highest salaried man in the office, fails to display a proper interest in his work, it can hardly be expected that the subordinate employees will do more. Post-office clerks and city letter carriers are required by law to perform eight hours service daily in order to receive a day's pay, and it is certainly only fair to the Government that postmasters should be required to devote an equal number of hours to their duties. If this were done, particularly at offices of the third class, it is confidently believed that a large saving would be effected in the cost of clerk hire, and that the efficiency of the service would also be increased materially, as frequently these small offices are left for hours at a time in charge of irresponsible children while the postmaster is giving his attention to personal business.

It is therefore recommended that the attention of postmasters now in the service be called to the requirement that eight hours' personal service shall be given by them to their respective offices, and that evidence which tends to show that this rule is not being complied with which may reach the department will be regarded as sufficient cause for the immediate appointment of their successor. Furthermore, it is recommended that now appointees, before being commissioned, be required to pledge themselves in writing to devote their full time and attention to their official duties and perform such service as would seem to be consistent with the size of the office.

CLASSIFICATION OF POSTMASTERS.

On November 30, 1908, and on October 15, 1912, Executive orders were issued covering into the classified civil service certain postmasters at offices of the fourth class. The first order included the postmasters at all such offices in the 14 States north of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi Rivers, and the order of October 15, 1912, included all remaining postmasters at offices of the above class in the United States, with the exception of those in Alaska, Guam, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Samoa. The criticism to be made of these orders is that they classified more than 45,000 postmasters, who had been appointed solely upon political considerations, without any test whatever as to their qualifications for these positions. It would have been more in line with the fundamental principles of civil service, and also with the practice which has prevailed with reference to extensions of the service, to have first classified the positions, leaving the incumbents to be classified individually upon furnishing the Postmaster General satisfactory evidence of their fitness for the positions they occupied. It is recommended that the orders be amended so as to correct this injustice.

It is further recommended that steps be taken toward the classification of presidential offices.

NEW EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

It is apparent that a general readjustment of work was necessary in many post offices in order to bring the 8-hour-a-day service of post-office clerks and city letter carriers in all cases within the 10-hour period prescribed by the provision in the act of August 24, 1912. While an earnest effort is being made to impress upon postmasters at all first and second class offices the necessity of conforming strictly to the requirements of this new law, some confusion seems to still exist in certain quarters as to the department's attitude in the matter. There should be no doubt in this regard, as the efficiency and cost of the service is reflected in the manner in which this law is enforced. It is recommended, therefore, that a carefully prepared circular letter, setting forth in appropriate detail the purpose of the law and emphasizing the department's position in the matter, be addressed to all postmasters of the first and second classes.

COST STATISTICS.

The committee feels that the time has arrived when the Post Office Department should have a statistical bureau, charged with the duty of compiling statistical data for comparisons between the units of work and the units of cost for the different classes of work performed in the several branches of the service. With these data officers of the department would be able to determine where the service is being most economically administered and to apply suitable remedies for correcting lax and uneconomical methods. Such a bureau would be charged with the duty of preparing scientifically and furnishing to the officers of the department intelligent information regarding the adequacy and inadequacy of postage rates based on the cost of handling and carrying the several classes of mail matter and the rendering of special services with which this department is charged, all of which would look to a proper standardization of the department's methods and practices.

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS.

That the department apply itself to a close study and a proper administration of the service as it now exists, keeping in close touch with the postmasters and others forming the framework of the postal organization, impressing upon them the fact that the department will expect them to give to their respective communities the best possible service and to report promptly their inability to do so with the facilities at their command, accompanying such report with suggestions and such other information as will enable the department to analyze the conditions and assist them toward the end desired.

That early attention be given to the question of a comprehensive method of postal accounting that will include all items that enter into the cost of conducting the Post Office Department.

That the matter of reassignment of rooms to the several bureaus and divisions be given prompt attention in order to effect a better working condition throughout the department.

That steps be taken to improve existing conditions in the department as to furniture and equipment.

That the Postal Savings System be assigned to the bureau of the Third Assistant Postmaster General as a separate division of that bureau.

That authority be obtained from Congress permitting the selection of sites for Federal buildings to be used for post office purposes by the Post Office Department.

That the matter of Sunday service at post offices be given careful attention.

That an order be issued by the Postmaster General discontinuing backstamping, except as to special delivery and registered mail, at all post offices.

That a committee of postal experts be appointed without delay to visit a number of representative post offices of each class for the purpose of studying the best method for handling parcel-post matter and also other features of post-office work.

That early attention be given to the question of discontinuing the use of distinctive stamps now required by law for parcel-post matter.

That an investigation be made with a view to the establishment of an equitable scheme for standardization of work in the department and the equalization of salaries.

That the department make further inquiry into the Canadian system for bonding postal employees with a view to adopting, if feasible, some such system in the United States service.

That postmasters at presidential offices be advised that they will be required to devote their full time and attention to their offices and perform service commensurate with the salary of the office.

That early steps be taken looking toward the classification of presidential offices.

That a circular letter be prepared and sent to all postmasters of the first and second class with reference to the law limiting the service of post-office clerks and city carriers to eight hours.

That a bureau of statistics be established.

Respectfully,

DANIEL C. ROPER,
First Assistant Postmaster General.
JOSEPH STEWART,
Second Assistant Postmaster General.
A. M. DOCKERY,
Third Assistant Postmaster General.
JAS. I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.
M. O. CHANCE,
Chief Clerk Post Office Department.

Does anyone believe for a moment that Mr. Stewart would dare attach his signature to a report which he knew to be false and erroneous? Does anyone believe for a moment that Mr. Chance, who had served Mr. Hitchcock as chief clerk for two or three years, would likewise do the same? I assert this evening without fear of successful contradiction that the first fiscal year of Postmaster General Burleson's term was the only year that has shown a surplus since 1884. There had been a deficit in the Post Office Department from 1884 down to 1914. For the benefit of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] I want to read from the first report which Postmaster General Hitchcock made. It is very instructive, and certainly the gentleman from Minnesota will accept it as being authoritative. Says Mr. Hitchcock:

When the present postal administration entered upon the discharge of its duties last March, it was confronted with the largest deficit in the history of the department. The excess of expenditures over receipts for the fiscal year 1909 proved to be $17,441,719.82. To this sum should be added postal funds lost by fire, burglary, etc., to the amount of $37,750.65, making a total deficit of $17,479,470.47.

So far as I am personally concerned, as I said a moment ago, I do not care whether there was a surplus or a deficit in the department at the close of Mr. Hitchcock's administration. I want to stand and give testimony for him this evening that he worked wonders in reducing the deficit from $17,000,000 to $750,000 in four years' time.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I will yield for a question only.

Mr. REAVIS. Does the gentleman consider it of importance as to whether a surplus or a deficit existed, if the money was judiciously expended and required for the efficiency of the service?

Mr. COX. As I said a moment ago, as far as I am concerned, I do not think it amounts to anything. Of course, if we can make it self-sustaining, so as to prevent taxation upon the people to supply the deficiency, so much the better. But I put these figures in the RECORD for the purpose of answering the criticism made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] yesterday against the present Postmaster General.

Reading from the Third Assistant Postmaster General's report yesterday, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] thought he had found a "mare's-nest," because he said that the report showed that in 1914 the rumblings of a European war were heard, and that the present postal deficit, amounting to approximately $11,000,000, was attributed to the European war.

Were there any rumblings of a European war in 1909? Was there any war anywhere? That was at the close of Mr. Roosevelt's administration, to which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] and every Republican points with pride as being the greatest era of prosperity this country ever saw.

But Mr. Hitchcock in his report explains the reason why or, at least, partially explains the reason why there was such an enormous deficit. Says Mr. Hitchcock:

> Simultaneously with the great deficit in the Postal Service the Nation's income suffered last year a serious depletion incident to financial depression.

If the postal revenues suffered a depletion because of financial depression, is it not fair, is it not legitimate, to say that the postal revenues suffered a great depletion because of the foreign war that is now going on? But that is not all, that is not the high-water mark that has been reached. The high-water mark of postal deficit was reached at the close of the fiscal year 1908, again under Mr. Roosevelt's administration, when it reached the enormous and appalling sum of upward of $19,000,000. Here I repeat that since the year 1884 down to the present time, or down until 1914, every fiscal year has concluded with a postal deficit ranging from three to ten million dollars.

The gentleman took Mr. Burleson to very severe task because of Mr. Burleson's issuing an order permitting third-class matter to the mail. If I remember correctly, and I do not want to misquote him, he answered Mr. LLOYD that third-class mail matter was carried at a profit before the order of the Postmaster General was issued, some time in 1914, permitting catalogues to be carried through the mails. Again I want to call the gentleman's attention to Mr. Hitchcock's report made in 1909, which plainly shows that third-class matter, which includes catalogues, was carried in the year 1908 at a loss of $3,229,512.12. Even under the former regulations, when catalogues did pay a higher rate of postage than they pay now, third-class matter was carried at a loss.

I do not know anything about the workings of the order permitting catalogues to be sent through the mail, whether it has had a tendency to deplete the postal revenues or not; but if it has I undertake to say that there has been a corresponding benefit in the way of increased fourth-class matter or parcel post. I believe it was unfair for the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] to leave the impression that the present Post Office Department is being administered solely for political purposes. I do not believe politics has any place in this discussion, and had it not been for the remarks that the gentleman injected into his speech respecting it I should not have referred to it.

So far as the present bill is concerned there are not very many new things in it, except what is known as the bonding feature and the railway-mail pay, with a few things recommended by the Post Office Department. The bonding feature is, of course, a new proposition, not so new, but new in this sense, that it is the first time it has ever reached the floor of this House in its present tangible form. If you will go back and read Mr. Hitchcock's report in 1909, you will find that he advocated it in most vigorous language at that time and assigned unanswerable reasons why a law of that kind should be passed. The Members who were here in the Sixtieth Congress, or, perhaps, the Sixty-first, I am not quite sure which, will remember the time when the bonding companies got together and automatically raised the rate of insurance from $1.26 to $2.43. It created such a storm of abuse, it aroused such fierce and frightful opposition, that Congress quickly passed a joint resolution appointing three Members of the House and three Members of the Senate to investigate it. Hon. James A. Tawney, then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, was head of the commission so far as the House was concerned. After sitting for weeks and months and hearing testimony on the subject the commission reported back to Congress that there was no necessity, no use, for the automatic increase in bonding rates of 100 per cent. The result was, if I recall correctly, they were permitted to increase the rates 35 per cent. Not content with that, unable to do directly a thing they wanted to do at that time, they are now endeavoring to do the same thing indirectly.

It is a maxim of law, too well established to be repeated, that a man can not do indirectly what he can not do directly. As the bonding companies were frustrated from increasing their rates 100 per cent, they have sought to do the same thing, in a measure, indirectly.

For instance, they have sought out certain bidders or would-be bidders handling the United States mails. They have endeavored to fix the contracts. They have said to this bidder and to that bidder, "We will not bond you for $40,000." The bidder says, "I can handle that mail for $40,000; I know what I can do, and am willing to undertake it." But the bonding companies say, "You must bid $50,000 or $55,000 upon the contract; otherwise we refuse to bond you." That condition became so notorious that last November Postmaster General Burleson assigned two of his best post-office inspectors to look up this matter. One of them was Mr. Cortelyou, a brother of the ex-Postmaster General and at one time Secretary of the United States Treasury, and the other was Mr. Kinyoun, from the State of New York. After weeks and months of patient and careful investigation these inspectors reported to the Post Office Department an exceedingly nasty condition of affairs, so far as the bonding companies are concerned. While before our committee Mr. Lyman, if I remember correctly, the vice president of the bonding company, when asked by the chairman of our committee, or perchance by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]—I am not sure which—"Suppose the Government can, by a guaranty fund, safeguard itself and do it cheaper than you can do it, would not you be willing to let the Government do it?" The answer was, "No." What was the reason? Because the Government had no right to enter into private business in competition with private individuals! I am always for the individual man if the individual man acts squarely with his fellow man; but where individual men combine for the purpose of defrauding a vast number of the people of this country, then I am in favor of the Government stepping in and taking charge of the situation and protecting the mass of the people.

Why, gentlemen, this same argument was used here for 30 years to defeat the establishment of postal savings banks. They said that the Government had no right to enter into a private business; that it would be going into the banking business, if we ever established the postal savings banks. And by one argument and another for 30 years special interests were able to defeat the enactment of postal savings bank laws. And be it said to the credit of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], who is now holding a seat at the other end of the Capitol, while he was chairman of this committee we reported out of that committee a postal savings bank law that has not hurt private interests at all, but is benefiting, yes, hundreds and thousands of American citizens. The same identical argument was used here for 30 years to prevent Congress from passing a parcel-post law. It was said that the parcel post would hurt local business, and for 30 years they were able to keep that law off the statute books. It was said that it put the Government in competition with private business. And be it said to the credit of the chairman of our committee, the gentleman from Tennessee, the Hon. JOHN A. MOON, in the Sixty-third Congress introduced a bill for a parcel post, and he never ceased to fight until it was finally enacted into law. To him, more than anyone else, credit should be given for the enactment of this legislation.

So when they answer us that the Government has no right to go into private business, I answer back that if the Government is the only institution in the country that can break up a monopoly, let the Government go into it. [Applause.]

I rejoiced sincerely in seeing in the papers this week that the other end of the Capitol, in the very face and in open defiance of the Armor Plate Trust of the country, reported a bill out appropriating $11,000,000 to build an armor-plate plant in this country. [Applause.] They did that when they were distinctly told by the trust that if they did so they, the trust, would raise the price of armor plate $200 a ton upon the Government. They might perhaps increase the cost of the construction of our present battleships a little, but as soon as the armor plant gets to running we will recoup and recover it manyfold over. In my judgment, the only wise and intelligent thing to do is for Congress to pass this bonding feature.

The only criticism I have upon that part of the bill at all is that it is not strong enough, that it does not go far enough. If I had it in my power and I were writing a bill to that effect, I would compel every postal employee who is required to render a bond to enter into this guaranty fund. The bonding of employees and of contractors is just as much of a function of the Post Office Department as the raising of an army, as the making of munitions of war. The Post Office Department can not run, it can not operate, without postal buildings, post roads, railroads, employees, and many of its employees have to be bonded; and when we require bonds of our employees or contractors it is as much a function of the Post Office Department to do that as it is to transport the mails.

Why, for five years, gentlemen, the average loss to the Government of the United States on account of defaulted bonds, or where the bonds were not sufficiently high, has been $50,000 per year. That $50,000 has to be made up in some way, somehow, by some one. Why, they got so bold and audacious about this thing that one of the attorneys here in the city of Washington by the name of Finley, this last summer, proceeded to send out over the United States circulars to proposed bidders on star-route mail service and screen-wagon city service, warning them to be careful about their bid this year. The last I heard of that gentleman the other day he was cited to appear before the Post Office Department and show cause why he should not be debarred from appearing before it. And, knowing the Postmaster General as I do, I have no hesitancy in saying that the gentleman will never again be permitted to inspect the files of the Post Office Department so far as the bonding of employees or contractors is concerned.

Gen. Blakslee, the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, estimates that on account of and by reason of the conduct of the bonding companies we have lost approximately one and one-half million dollars per year. These are facts, gentlemen. They are stubborn facts, from which there can possibly be no escape, and from which there can be no appeal. So the time has come, in my judgment, for this House to line up as a unit, as man to man, and put this bonding feature over and settle it, and settle it forever, and when it is settled that way it will be settled right. It is left optional with the postal employees as to whether they want to give a fidelity and guaranty bond or whether they want to come into this fund to be collected by the Government, out of which the losses will finally be made good. That is the part to which I referred a moment ago, which, in my judgment, is not right. But my criticism upon that is a friendly criticism. I would compel every employee who is required to be bonded by the Government in the handling of mails to come into this guaranty fund. It might be—I do not know—necessary and essential in order to start this fund in the first instance that Congress be required to make a small appropriation. It is estimated that probably $50,000 may have to be appropriated in order to start it, and that after it is started it will be self-sustaining, and out of which fund, when it finally accumulates, the Government can recoup the $50,000 which it has made in the way of appropriation to start it. So if we are called upon even to vote an appropriation of $50,000 to start this fund, in my judgment the department ought to have it. I think we will soon get it back.

As I said awhile ago, after litsening to the splendid analytical argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], I am rather slow and somewhat loath to enter upon a discussion of that branch of this bill. I think he has demonstrated, and demonstrated conclusively, that the railroads under this provision will get from $5,000,000 to $6,000,000 per year more than they are getting under the old system. I say to you frankly, while I do not want to err against a railroad any more than I would dislike to err against my fellowman, if I felt that the time could never come when the Government would recoup in some way that extra $6,000,000 which to my mind the railroads will get under this bill, I could not conscientiously support it. But I think that the time will come—I do not know just when, nor do I know just how—when the railroads will be paid approximately exactly what they are entitled to be paid, and that the people will not be overcharged to pay them more than they ought to be paid for it.

Of course parcel post is yet in its infancy. It is, in a measure, undeveloped. We started it at first with a 11-pound limit. Within a short period of time we went to 20 pounds. A little bit later we went to 50 pounds from the first to, and including, the second zone; and I imagine that ere long we will see the parcel-post package growing possibly to 100 or 150 or 160 pounds. If that time comes, then, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] explained, in the storage cars carrying from 20 to 30 tons of fourth-class matter, I believe the Government will recover some of the extra pay and extra money which we will pay to the railroads under this bill. Why, you can not get the railroads down to a business proposition on this to save your life. Those who are interested in the hearings, if they will get them and read them, will find where member after member of the committee propounded this question to various representatives of the various railroads: "How much do you think you ought to have over what we propose to give you in this bill?" There was not but one man who appeared before our committee who would even venture an opinion upon that proposition. He said he thought the railroads ought to have 30 per cent more than we propose to give them in this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. No; 30 per cent of the revenues.

Mr. COX. I stand corrected. Yes; 30 per cent of the total revenues of the Post Office Department. That was his idea about it, and that was just as near as any representative of any railroad ever came to making a statement before our committee, that he thought they ought to have 30 per cent of the total postal receipts of the Post Office Department of the United States, which would mean, if it were given them, between ninety and one hundred million dollars a year for the handling of the mails.

You noticed, no doubt, in this morning's Post, and you have noticed, probably, in all the daily newspapers that reach the city of Washington, one whole page of advertising, addressed to the Speaker of the House, addressed to various Members of the House, to the effect that they are not satisfied with the provisions of pay contained in this bill, saying that the pay is too low, that it is confiscatory, that it is dangerous to the railroads. And yet not one of them before our committee, or before the commission, ever came down and said, "We can haul the mails for this," or "We can haul them for that." For them it is all guesswork, and their guesswork is on the big side. They say, "Give us all you have got, and we will be satisfied with it."

The Government of the United States is paying, if I remember correctly, 21 cents a mile for the transportation of fish cars, distributing fish from various Government fish hatcheries in the United States to other points in the United States. They accept that pay from the Government at the rate of 21 cents a mile. We do not stop at 21 cents a mile. We give them 21 cents a mile for every full railway postal car, 21 cents a mile for storage cars, and terminal fees in addition.

That they are paid to-day as much as they are entitled to be paid, I entertain no doubt whatever, but for fear that we might be mistaken. We have placed in this bill a provision which says to them, "You can go now, as soon as this bill becomes a law, to the great Interstate Commerce Commission, and let them fix the rate; let them determine in a measure the amount of appropriation which Congress shall make to you for the transportation of the mails." If they can not trust the Interstate Commerce Commission to do this fairly for them, in the name of common sense whom can they trust?

They have made this a baffling question since 1872, particularly since 1876. This fight has been on from that date down to the present hour; and at last, like a lion in its lair, they are at bay, unwilling to give any figures, unwilling to give any data, unwilling to give even an intelligent estimate of the amount of money which they should receive. But they say boldly and blandly, "Give us 30 per cent of the postal revenues and we will accept it."

To me this extra $5,000,000 or $6,000,000, which I feel sure we are going to give them, does not sound very well. But in order to get away from this old, ancient, antiquated, worn-out system of handling the mails of the United States, I am willing to vote for it, and I am willing to give it my most earnest and loyal support. It is the only intelligent way to fix it. Why, the very idea of paying the railroads on the weight basis, as we are doing, and in addition to that paying them $5,000,000 a year rent for 1,400 post-office cars, there is no business about it; it is cumbersome and it is clumsy, and the bare fact that the railroads fit up and equip these railway post-office cars and accept so much rent is to me a recognition on the part of the railroads of the space basis as being the sound and logical basis on which to pay them. They have never kicked upon that; they have never objected to it in any way whatever, because they have gotten on an average of from $3,500 to $3,800 a year rental for each car, the maximum cost of which does not exceed $12,000.

But, in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, the railroads are willing to accept this proposition, and I am not sure but that they are even anxious to accept it. I am not sure but that they are talking to us in the voice of Jacob, but holding out to us the hand of Esau. But, be that as it may, I voted for this bill in the committee, and I give it my unqualified and loyal support from now on, because I think the theory is right. I am convinced that it is right, and that if we have made any mistake there is a commission to whom the people of the United States can appeal who will do right by the people. If the time ever comes when we can not trust the Interstate Commerce Commission on this little question, we had better abolish it; because it has brought order out of chaos, and the result is that to-day the Interstate Commerce Commission are handling the freight and passenger rates upon 250,000 miles of steam railroads in the United States in the most satisfactory manner. That commission is open to the railroads and open to the people through the Postmaster General. If injustice, injury, or wrong be done by us against the railroads or against the people, I am thoroughly convinced that the commission will rectify the wrong.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said a moment ago, these two provisions, the bonding feature and the railway-mail pay, are about all the new features that there are in it. If Members will carefully and conscientiously read the hearings—as to this bonding feature they are not voluminous—I think every Member of this House will unanimously support it. I hope the Members who have time will read the hearings as to railway-mail pay; that they will take the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], analyze it, study it, think about it in the light of reason; and if they will do that I do not believe there will be a dissenting vote upon the floor of the House, on either side of the Chamber, upon the question of railway-mail pay.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. COX. I will yield for a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. On what theory does the committee proceed in recommending this bonding indemnity feature, in making a charge against all the postal employees of the country for the misdeeds or defalcations of some other employees?

Mr. COX. The Government is losing at the present time from $50,000 to $60,000 a year——

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not know that the gentleman understands my question.

Mr. COX. I think I will get to it. I think I understand it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentleman will do so before he concludes.

Mr. COX. That defalcation or loss, as I said a while ago, is due to different things, particularly to two things. First the bond may not be sufficient to cover the loss. Second, the surety may not be solvent. The Government may not be able to collect on the bond. The Government can not collect from a surety any more than the penalty expressed in the bond, because the penalty expressed in the bond becomes a contract between the Government on the one side and the bonded employee and his surety on the other. In other words, the liability of the bond can not be increased. Now, by collecting a fund and putting it, as it were, into a common reservoir, out of which the Government will pay all defalcations and all shortages, we believe it will be impossible for the Government ever to be defrauded out of anything. I do not know that I have answered the gentleman's question.

Mr. STAFFORD. The idea that was running in my mind, and has been for several years, is this: Why should the Government, responsible, as it is, to meet all defalcations, charge up to the individual postal employee a pro rata expense in the way of a tax for the defalcation of some other postal employee?

Mr. COX. That is exactly what the bonding companies are doing to the employees to-day.

Mr. STAFFORD. I realize that; but why should the Government, which can meet all its obligations, inaugurate the practice now of taxing the postal employees generally for the defalcation of some one employee?

Mr. COX. I know of no way in the world by which the Government can segregate that.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will allow me, it does not do what the gentleman from Wisconsin thinks it does. Every man in the Postal Service has the right to give an individual bond or a surety bond, or he has the choice to contribute to this indemnity fund.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but why make the individual postal employee contribute to this fund, which is for the protection of the Government? By so doing he pays a tax to the Government to protect it against the defalcations and shortcomings of other employees.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will certainly agree that it would be almost impossible for the Government to run 75,000 separate accounts, if it has 75,000 bonded employees, and the only way to do it is to make a common fund for all of them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Going back still further to the essence of the question, why should not the Government itself bear the loss, without taxing the individual employee?

Mr. COX. Is it the gentleman's position that the Government ought to stand this loss without bonding its employees?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will say to the gentleman that the theory of insurance is merely to protect the insured against loss, when the individual concern is not in a position to stand the loss itself.

Mr. COX. I do not know of any private business, where occasion requires it, but what bonds it employees.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here is the Government, strong enough to stand any loss by its power of taxation, levying a portion of that loss under this system on all postal employees.

Mr. MOON. The Government is not levying it on all employees. Under the present bonding system each employee of the Government pays to a bonding company $1 on a thousand dollars of his bond to make his bond. The Government proposes to charge him 75 cents on a thousand to make his bond.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am well aware of that, but here the Government is undertaking a new system of indemnification, and I now put the question directly to the gentleman. Why should the Government tax the individual employee for the defalcation of some other employee?

Mr. COX. Would it be the gentleman's idea that the Government ought not to bond any of its employees at all?

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the committee considered that phase of the question?

Mr. COX. I do not think we ever did for a moment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Taxing every employee for the defalcation of one.

Mr. MOON. We do not do that.

Mr. STAFFORD. You do it so far as they undertake to avail themselves of this system.

Mr. COX. That is exactly what the employees are doing now.

Mr. GARLAND. Why not carry the same system through all the departments of the Government, the Internal-Revenue System, and the customhouses, and every other department?

Mr. COX. With all due deference to the gentleman, if he will wait a little while we will soon do that. I have no doubt that this will be so satisfactory to the Government in this department that it will carry it to the other departments. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAINEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10484, the Post Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 146. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan, issue, or use quartermaster's and medical supplies for the relief of destitute persons in the districts overflowed by the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following concurrent resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 16.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations are authorized to change the text of the paragraph in the bill for payment of judgments in Indian depredation claims, so as to correct errors in the certified description of two of the judgments provided for therein.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask that the Clerk also read the letter of the Attorney General explaining this.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, February 11, 1916.

Hon. JOHN. J. FITZGERALD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington D. C.

SIR: Referring to House Document No. 564, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, containing a list of judgments in favor of claimants in Indian-depredation cases for which no appropriation has heretofore been made, which judgments, I understand, will be appropriated for in the pending urgent deficiency bill, I beg to call your attention to errors in two of the cases included therein.

"Andrew D. Everett, administrator Thomas W. Everett, deceased," should read "Thomas W. Everett, administrator Andrew D. Everett, deceased." This error was corrected by order of the Court of Claims dated February 10, 1916, and entered nunc pro tunc as of October 11, 1915.

"Mrs. Joseph E. Winn, administratrix John Winn, deceased," should read "John M. Winn and Mrs. Joseph E. Winn, administrators John Winn, deceased."

These judgments can not be paid by the Treasury Department unless the document is corrected as indicated; and if the corrections are made, it will obviate the necessity of reporting these two cases again to Congress.

For the Attorney General.
Respectfully,

HUSTON THOMPSON,
Assistant Attorney General.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman inform the House whether the Department of Justice since this bill has been drafted has examined all the items to see whether they are correct in phraseology along the lines indicated by the letter just read?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, these judgments are certified to the House and are included in the deficiency appropriation bill. Since the certification of the documents the Court of Claims by order corrected the title in one of the cases and made the correction in the other which is mentioned. This concurrent resolution is merely to permit the conferees to modify the text, which is not in dispute, and therefore can not be modified otherwise, so as to provide a proper reference to the persons entitled to the money and avoid the necessity of amending this bill by some other bill later in the session.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand it is quite necessary for the conferees to have this authority if they are going to change the phraseology which is not in dispute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DALLINGER for two days, on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, February 12, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 12, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee for the mighty men of valor Thou hast raised up among us. In every crisis of our national history Thou hast laid Thy hand upon some great heart and given to him divine commission. Thou hast given power where power was needed. Thou hast added grace to sanctify the power.

We hold in sacred memory to-day the name of Lincoln. We thank Thee for the life he lived among us and for the larger life we live because of him. We thank Thee for the place he holds in our national history and for the larger place that he lives in the sacred memory of the heart of our great Nation. We pray that Thou wilt enable all men in leadership to emulate his virtues.

We pray Thee to lay Thy hand upon mighty men of valor in our day that they may lead us forward in the achievement of yet greater victories in our moral and spiritual life as a people, and that all our life work may lead to honor and justice and truth. May this Nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are born equal, not cease its glorious mission until all men gain that higher freedom wherewith Thy Son shall make us free. We ask these things for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Wednesday, February 9, 1916, was read and approved.

THREAT OF ARMOR-PLATE MANUFACTURERS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, on Thursday last there appeared in the New York World an editorial so illuminating and instructive that I laid it aside to have it read here, but the executive session kept me from doing so. I ask that it be read now for the information of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator what is the particular subject?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is on the threat of the armor-plate manufacturers to charge the Government $200 a ton more for armor plate in the event the Government dares build its own plant.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the New York World, Feb. 10, 1916.]

ARMOR PLATE'S DEFIANCE.

Something more than momentary indignation should follow the threat of the armor-plate makers that they will not tolerate competition by the United States Government. We have national shipbuilding plants as a check upon private enterprise, too often found in combination. The need of national armor-plate plants, obvious for the same reason, becomes imperative when private enterprise openly threatens extortion and revenge.

Monopolistic arrogance has never gone further than in this instance. Our armor-plate makers are the chief beneficiaries of the traffic in munitions of war. At the expense of many friendships, the Government has supported them in their legal rights, but there is no denial of the fact that they are coining money out of blood and hatred. The hands that they now raise menacingly against a Nation by whose neutrality they have profited are filled with the gains of a business that ignores the moralities and is content to stand upon the strict letter of the law.

These are the men who have complicated the question of national defense by their gluttonous attempt to bend the whole movement in their own selfish interest. With pockets stuffed as a result of the agony of Europe, they have sought to make of the necessity for reasonable defense at home an opportunity to oppress a people at peace. They want Government to protect them, their property, and their trade. They even expect Government to go to war in their behalf. Yet a suggestion of independence on the part of that Government is met by the terrorism of monopolistic prices to-day and of dismantled plants to-morrow.

What is new in all this is not the contemplated robbery of the people. For many years that was a matter of course, and it may be so now. The investigation of 1896 showed that whereas the United States had been charged $540 a ton for armor plate, the product was regularly sold to foreign Governments for $249 a ton. At that time pressure was exerted chiefly upon the Republican Party, whose campaign chests were regularly enriched. Now, with a different régime in power, it manifests itself in coercion and defiance.

These are the men, or the successors of the men, also, who in 1894, on the testimony of naval experts, were fined $140,484.94 by President Cleveland for delivering to the Government armor plate that was notoriously defective, full of blowholes, cracked and resurfaced, never honestly tested, and far short of specifications in other respects. Some of this armor was intended for the ships that won the Spanish War. If it had not been detected, it might even now be the weak defense upon which in a great emergency American life, honor, and property would depend.

Congress can not afford to ignore the spirit exhibited by this combination. The first step toward preparedness in this direction must be an assertion of national sovereignty that will not be forgotten by incorporated greed and incorporated disloyalty.

FORT DOUGLAS, UTAH.

Mr. SMOOT. I present a memorial from the Salt Lake Commercial Club and the Rotary Club, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD. It is not long.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialists, the people of the State of Utah, through the Commercial Club (INC.) and the Rotary Club, of Salt Lake City, respectfully represent—

That the part of wisdom and prudence demands that in time of peace due care should be taken and preparation made to meet a necessity for the public defense.

That a due measure of care and preparation is not satisfied by the providing of men, munitions, supplies, and equipment, however well; it further demands that facilities be provided that will enable such resources to be immediately and at all times used to the limits of effectiveness and efficiency.

That such use of military resources requires the maintenance of permanent depots for recurring concentration and distribution of men, munitions, and supplies.

That geographical position, railroad transportation facilities, and climatic conditions fix the location of such depots.

That the Pacific coast and the Mexican border must be considered as requiring defense, and it must be anticipated that men and supplies may be required thereon at any time.

That Salt Lake City is practically the center of a circle, the radii of which are equivalent to substantially 30 hours of railroad travel, and which reach every railroad point on one-third of the length of the Canadian border, one-half of the Mexican, and the entire Pacific coast line.

That military depots should be situate far enough inland from coast and borders so as to at all times be a military asset and never an embarrassment.

That Salt Lake City is the only city east of the Pacific coast and within effective transportation distance thereof and of the Canadian and Mexican borders that has such incoming and outgoing railroad facilities as a great and permanent concentration depot for men and supplies require, and its climatic conditions are most suitable: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Congress is most respectfully requested and urged to enact such legislation as will immediately make Fort Douglas, Utah, a brigade post—so planned and constructed, in connection with the military maneuver grounds in close proximity thereto, as to be the western point for the concentration and distribution of men and supplies, in case of active military operations on the Pacific coast or western borders.

SALT LAKE COMMERCIAL CLUB (INC.),
By F. C. RICHMOND.
SALT LAKE ROTARY CLUB,
By F. C. SCHRAMM.
WESLEY KING, Chairman Joint Committee.

A STATEMENT IN SUPPORT OF THE MEMORIAL OF THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF UTAH, THROUGH THE COMMERCIAL AND ROTARY CLUBS, OF SALT LAKE CITY, TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES, RELATING TO THE SITUATION AND ADVANTAGES OF FORT DOUGLAS, UTAH, AS A MILITARY DEPOT.

The following propositions are advanced:

The ultimate defense of a country rests upon its mobile army.

The coast and boundary lines, and the territory adjacent thereto, are the parts of a country requiring defense against invasion.

The tactical points for the concentration of the military forces of a country in permanent posts are the points from which the shortest equal radii render the greatest extent of coast and territorial border line equally accessible.

The tactical points for the concentration of reserves and supplies in time of invasion are the proper points for the location of permanent army posts from the standpoint of economy and efficiency.

Large permanent army posts should not be maintained on or near the coast or border.

Concerning the above it may be said:

The proposition that the ultimate defense of a country rests upon its mobile army is axiomatic and permits of no discussion.

That the coast and boundary lines and the territory adjacent thereto are the parts of a country requiring defense against invasion is also obvious.

That the tactical points, and therefore the proper points, for the concentration of the military forces and military supplies of a country, in permanent posts and depots, are the points from which the shortest equal radii render the greatest extent of coast and territorial border line equally accessible, is a proposition that, upon a fair consideration, forces its own approval.

Roughly speaking, the United States has 4,500 miles of international boundary and approximately the same number of miles of seacoast. It is obviously impracticable to maintain either troops or Army posts along the extent of these lines in sufficient numbers to provide a ghost of a defense against invasion. Outside of the semicircle of the range of our coast fortifications, the greater part of the seacoast, and practically the whole of the boundary line, are open to the entry or landing of an invading army. In other words, such force may practically choose its own point of landing or entry and it is impossible for this Government to determine in advance where the point or points selected will be. It follows, therefore, that in case of an attempted invasion, troops for actual defense must be concentrated at the time, and where, the danger is imminent.

No further presentation of facts would seem required to show that permanent stations of troops should be at points from which they can be transported to any threatened locality on the border or coast in the least time, and when we consider the uncounted years to come, and what may be their history, we are forced to the conclusion that all border and coast lines demand the same facilities for, and certainty of, prompt protection.

If a substantial body of troops be stationed at a point practically equidistant from 2,500 miles of border and coast line—assuming proper railroad transporation facilities exist—they can be moved to any locality on this line in substantially the same length of time and be present at any point thereon at the time of attempted invasion, unless such invasion comes without suspicion and with the stealth of a thief in the night.

But the importance of a station so located rests strongly in the advantages that woud accrue after the outbreak of hostilities and it becomes necessary to send reserves and reinforcements to the scene of actual combat. If a permanent Army post is so located that a given number of miles of travel—say, 700—will reach any point of the 2,500 miles of coast and border, such troops can be detrained at the locality where they are most needed in 48 hours or less—the equivalent of but a two days' march. What is true regarding troops is equally true in regard to equipment and supplies.

Should not such posts be so planned and constructed that new levies of troops could be there mobilized as fast as trained troops were sent out? Should not permanent posts, not makeshifts and temporary posts, be used for such mobilization?

The great proportion of deaths and disabilities from sickness come from the throwing together of wholly inexperienced and untrained men in canvas camps and temporary barracks under conditions to which they are entirely unused, and a great portion of this death loss and physical incapacity could be obviated if new levies were put in sanitary, permanent barracks and there properly trained and gradually inured to camp life.

Should not such posts also be supply depots, with ample storage facilities and fully stocked with field-service equipment to an extent commensurate with the probable necessities of the armies for which they are to form the base? And should not railroad facilities also be provided, so that stores and supplies could be received upon and shipped directly from warehouse platforms and troops entrained within the limits of the post itself?

Under the premises above said Fort Douglas, at Salt Lake City, Utah, meets all requirements to a greater extent than any other existing post in the United States. It is located substantially equidistant from the Pacific coast and the Canadian and Mexican boundaries. With it as a center, the arc of a circle having a radius of 700 miles includes practically 2,500 miles of border and seacoast line. From the points where the arc of such circle strikes the Canadian and Mexican boundaries to the west coast there are included substantially 11 of the 29 degrees of latitude covered by the United States, or, in other words, practically 700 miles of railroad travel—the equivalent of two days' march—would place troops from this little post upon any point on the Pacific coast and on the boundary lines of one-third of the width of the United States and upon any piece of ground within more than one-third of the territorial area of the United States.

The radii of 700 miles referred to are upon an air line. When great trunk-line railroads exist, running in approximately air lines—as is the case of the roads radiating from Fort Douglas—the ideal condition seems to be present. The Denver & Rio Grande and connections run practically direct to El Paso, on the Mexican border, and from there follow the border direct to San Antonio, Tex., and the Gulf, and also to Los Angeles, Cal. The San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake radiates to the southwest direct to Los Angeles and San Diego, Cal. The Southern Pacific and Western Pacific run nearly parallel to each other in a westerly direction to San Francisco. The Oregon Short Line and its connections strike to the north in two branches, one direct to Seattle and the Puget Sound country and the other to the north connecting with the Northern Pacific, which parallels the Canadian boundary.

The communication to the Canadian boundary on the north, the Puget Sound country in the Northwest, the central and southern Pacific coast, and the Mexican border is as direct as the connection of the spokes of a wheel with the hub and felly. No spot exists in the United States where, figuratively speaking, the military power of the country can reach out its arm and hold so many important points in the hollow of its hand, four of which are places where—for perhaps generations to come—we must anticipate attempted invasion.

All these points are within 44 hours of troop-train time; and, furthermore, the railroads named are not short local roads, which always embarass train service, but trunk lines, affording the best of transportation facilities, and the eastern connections with this hub are ample, embracing two direct transcontinental lines and two auxiliary lines in case of necessity.

At Salt Lake City, being a great transcontinental railroad center, the best of facilities for the immediate commandeering of cars and transportation equipment exist. Little or no delay has ever been, or will be, met in placing troops upon trains in a minimum time after moving orders are received, as has been the case at posts heretofore considered important. Attention is called to the fact that at the time of the mobilization at San Antonio in 1911 the Fifteenth Infantry, from Fort Douglas, was the second organization on the ground. A cursory investigation will show where the transportation facilities from other posts have broken down to the point of absurdity within the past two years.

An examination of the map showing the railroads radiating from Fort Douglas, and located within the territorial limits of the United States west thereof, will show that should a large body of troops be concentrated either in the Puget Sound country or in the vicinity of San Francisco or Los Angeles, and it became necessary to take a portion thereof from either locality to reenforce another, it would be necessary to bring the reenforcements back over the coast range, provided the railroad paralleling the coast in California, Oregon, and Washington should at any point be in the possession of or destroyed by an enemy or its agents. In the transfer of reenforcements from either of the other points to the Puget Sound country, if the coast road were not available it would be necessary to bring such reenforcing troops back to Salt Lake and from there transport them to the point required, and the probabilities are that in any case of the shifting of troops from one point on the coast to the other—again assuming the coast road to be not available—the transfer could be made in the shortest time by way of Salt Lake in lieu of the use of the local road crossing western Nevada south into California.

It therefore seems obvious that the true tactical policy is to locate troops and depots of supplies anticipated to be necessary for reenforcements at points on the Pacific coast and reserves for armies operating on that coast at Fort Douglas, from which point they would be equally available for service on the Mexican and Canadian borders.

That the tactical points of concentration of reserves and supplies in time of invasion are the proper points for the location of permanent army posts from the standpoint of economy and efficiency seems to be shown by inference from the foregoing discussion.

It is apparent that in time of war facilities for the mobilization of troops and the handling, distribution, and issue of equipment and supplies are taxed to the maximum. Therefore ample facilities should be provided in time of peace for the most efficient training of men and distribution of equipment and supplies for the maximum anticipated emergency.

As a problem, no difference appears to exist on principle between mobilization, training, and dispatch of troops and the equipment and supply thereof, and a great private business. We would not expect such private business to use its warehouses and working forces during the course of ordinary routine business and when an emergency of extensive trade and operations arose—to meet which was the object of its organization—to abandon its warehouses and preexisting system and attempt to do business at a way station on some unimportant railroad wherever chance and monetary convenience happened to dictate and entirely cut off from all proper facilities.

It needs no argument to prove that the maximum results in the way of discipline and instruction, in advancing efficiency and in the outfitting of troops, can be obtained at the place best equipped for such purpose. Neither does it need argument to show that the place that should be so equipped is a permanent Army post.

It is not contended but that certain utility posts now existing along the border should be at all times kept in usable condition, possibly by civilian caretakers, and it is doubted if sound policy will permit the sale and total abandonment of the majority of the existing military reservations of the United States. Their value, if kept in usable condition, by a service corps if necessary, very likely would, in time of emergency, far outweigh the benefit the United States would receive by a sale thereof. However, the futility of attempting to protect the border and coast of the United States by small fractions of the mobile army stationed at Army posts along the same has been referred to.

From the fact that it must be presumed that in case of attempted invasion some portion of the coast or border and the country adjacent thereto would fall into the hands of the enemy, it follows that a permanent Army post located within such district would fall into their hands, and from that moment it would cease to be of any value to the United States, for if again retaken it would probably have been destroyed. It is also to be expected that if such posts were permanent posts and depots of supplies they would invite capture, and, if not destroyed by the garrison before capture, would become an asset to the enemy.

It being demonstrated that Fort Douglas is properly located from a tactical standpoint for a large permanent Army post and depot of supplies, either in time of peace or war, the questions that present themselves are:

Is Fort Douglas so located with reference to Salt Lake City that troops stationed there may participate in all advantages available to the inhabitants of a large city?

The reservation is practically in Salt Lake City. A car line from the post communicates with all parts of the city and enters the residential parts thereof immediately upon leaving the reservation, and headquarters at the post is but 20 minutes distance from the center of the city. In all matters respecting education and those things in which the people of the city participate, Salt Lake City will rank with any other city of the United States of 300,000 inhabitants.

Are the climatic conditions suitable?

An examination of all statistics will show it to be exceptionally suitable. Its summer and snow seasons, with the temperature seldom reaching 10° below freezing point, present the ideal condition.

Are the grounds of the reservation and those available at moderate cost sufficient in extent?

The grounds of the reservation are more than sufficient for the barracks and necessary buildings and parade ground of a division. Any acreage of land, either connected with the reservation or in the city and adjacent to the transcontinental railway tracks passing through the city and suitable for warehouse purposes, can be readily secured with a moderate outlay. Twenty-five miles from the reservation a military reserve, comprising substantially 20,000 acres, immediately adjacent to two transcontinental railroads, is available for maneuver and target purposes either for Infantry or Artillery. The lay of the ground of this reservation is most suitable for camp purposes and for military maneuvers and problems and is sufficient for problems to be worked out by a division.

It is believed that the closer the facts are investigated the stronger will be the demonstration and conviction that Fort Douglas and Salt Lake City is the most proper point from all standpoints for the establishment and maintenance of a large and permanent Army post and depot of military supplies within the western section of the United States.

Arrangements have been made for the construction of a standard-gauge line of railroad connecting Fort Douglas directly with the transcontinental trunk line of railroad now entering Salt Lake City, and a bill has been introduced in Congress providing for permission by the Secretary of War for right of way and revocable license for the building of standard-gauge track upon and across Fort Douglas for the future convenience of the Government in transporting men and supplies.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1159) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of the Coos Head Military Reservation, in the State of Oregon, to the cities of Marshfield and North Bend, Oreg., both being municipal corporations, for park purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 134) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 403) granting to the State of Oklahoma permission to occupy a certain portion of the Fort Sill Military Reservation, Okla., and to maintain and operate thereon a fish hatchery, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 135) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3328) granting to the State of Oklahoma permission to occupy a certain portion of the Fort Sill Military Reservation, Okla., and to maintain and operate thereon a fish hatchery, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4701) to establish in the War Department and in the Navy Department, respectively, a roll, designated as "the Army and Navy medal of honor roll," and for other purposes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions, which was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 744) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Nelson H. Daniels, reported adversely thereon and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1782) to correct the military record of Joseph Gorman, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 136) thereon.

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1048) for the relief of Warren E. Day, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 137) thereon.

Mr. GRONNA, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 584) to provide a headstone for the grave of Scarlet Crow, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 140) thereon.

Mr. SAULSBURY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 2290) authorizing the health officer of the District of Columbia to issue a permit for the removal of the remains of the late Elsie McCaulley from Glenwood Cemetery, District of Columbia, to Philadelphia, Pa., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 138) thereon.

COLUMBUS DAY.

Mr. SAULSBURY. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 2291) to make October 12 of each and every year a public holiday in the District of Columbia, to be known as Columbus Day, and I submit a report (No. 139) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill. It will take only a moment, I think.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there any objection?

Mr. GRONNA. Let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

GRAND CALUMET RIVER BRIDGE, INDIANA.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 9213) to authorize the Gary Land Co. to construct a bridge across the Grand Calumet River, in the State of Indiana, and I submit a report (No. 132) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PARK CITY, UTAH.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 1559) to increase the limit of cost of public building at Park City, Utah, and I submit a report (No. 133) thereon. It is a short bill, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 4, after the word "increased" to strike out "$3,860" and insert "$5,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limit of cost of the United States Federal building at Park City, Utah, be, and the same is hereby, increased $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to meet the additional cost of changes and additions to said building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $600,000 for building ways, sheds, and machinery necessary to complete the equipment of the Portsmouth Navy Yard for the construction of battleships and other large naval vessels, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MYERS submitted an amendment providing that agents and others employed be allowed a per diem in lieu of subsistence when engaged in field work or travel on official business outside of the District of Columbia or when engaged on official business at their respective posts of duty at a rate of not exceeding $3 each, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 96) was read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 5,000 copies of Senate Document No. 116, Sixtieth Congress, first session, relating to grain grading and inspection and interstate and foreign commerce in grain.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if he knows the cost of the printing?

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

DIGEST OF CLAYTON ANTITRUST ACT.

Mr. OWEN. I offer a resolution providing for the printing of an index digest of the Clayton Antitrust Act which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Printing.

THE MERCHANT MARINE (S. DOC. NO. 320).

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CORRECTION IN ENROLLMENT OF BILL.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask the Senate to concur in the resolution.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. McCUMBER conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

H. R. 11078. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 319).

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 7, 9, and 22.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 4, 6, 10, 13, 15, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 23, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, and 39, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Omit all of that part of the matter inserted by said amendment after the word "purposes" in line 21; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$25,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"NATIONAL PARKS.

"There is appropriated, for the remainder of the fiscal year 1916, from the several appropriations for protection, improvement, and management, etc., of the various national parks, including the Hot Springs Reservation, as well as from the revenues from privileges, etc., in the national parks and the Hot Springs Reservation, such sum or sums as the Secretary of the Interior in his judgment may deem necessary, to be expended in employment of the superintendent of national parks in the District of Columbia and in the field, and other necessary expenses in connection with the administration of the national parks and the Hot Springs Reservation; a detailed statement of such expenditures to be submitted to Congress."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Transpose the matter inserted by said amendment to follow line 6, page 28, of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 30 of the bill, in line 1, after the sum "$59,259.50," insert the following: ", and the judgment therein in favor of 'Andrew D. Everett, administrator, Thomas W. Everett, deceased,' shall read 'Thomas W. Everett, administrator, Andrew D. Everett, deceased,' and the judgment in favor of 'Mrs. Joseph E. Winn, administratrix, John Winn, deceased,' shall read 'John M. Winn and Mrs. Joseph E. Winn, administrators, John Winn, deceased'"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 5, 11, and 14.

THOMAS S. MARTIN,
N. P. BRYAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
JOHN J. EAGAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Virginia as to what disposition has been made of the amendment which I offered to the bill providing for a suspension of the construction of the heat and light plant on the water front south of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving until it shall receive the approval of the Commission of Arts and of the President?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the conference committee did not agree to that amendment, and the report of the disagreement is contained in the conference report.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, in that connection I wish, then, to notify the Senate that the elimination of the amendment suspending the construction of the heat and light plant will, in my judgment, involve a very serious impairment of the general plans of Washington relating to the development of Potomac Park, the Mall, and the water front. I do hope that the Members of the Senate will get the hearings of architects and engineers before the Committee on the Library recently upon this important subject and consider the question as to whether it is not our duty now to insist upon that amendment, with a view to preventing the immediate construction of a building which, in my judgment and in the judgment of architects and artists throughout the country, will be an impairment of the general plan of Washington.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield.

Mr. PHELAN. I desire to ask the Senator from Nevada, who submitted the amendment, whether the letting of a contract for a building without first having obtained the approval of the Arts Commission is unlawful?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should say decidedly that it is, unless it in some way receives the ratification of Congress. The law provides——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator from Virginia will permit me, the law provides that such plans shall be submitted to the Commission of Fine Arts before the building is constructed. There is also an Executive order to the same effect. The plans for this building were never submitted to the Commission of Fine Arts until after the contract for its construction was let, and the report of the Commission of Fine Arts was adverse to the proposed structure.

Mr. PHELAN. What is the legal effect?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The legal effect, as I regard it, is that the contract is illegal, unless Congress in some way ratifies it by approving action.

Mr. PHELAN. May I ask who has the right of disputing the contract?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I imagine it would have to be done upon the initiative of Congress in some way or of the executive department. I do not suppose that an individual citizen would have the right to do so, but upon that I am not informed.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to go into the consideration of this report at the present time, but the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] notified me that he would object to its consideration, which would carry it over until Monday. If he is now waiving that objection and wants to take up the report for consideration and discussion, I shall be glad to have the matter proceeded with.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not prepared to go on at this time, Mr. President, but I simply wished to notify the Senate of the importance of this question, and to inform them that they can get information upon the subject by obtaining the printed hearings recently had before the Committee on the Library of the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I have no idea of going into any discussion of the matter, and I regret that anything has been said in the line of debate; but as something has been said, I will say to the Senate that I shall be very glad if every Senator on this floor will go and view in person the locality where it is proposed to erect this building. I am sure that it would not take 10 minutes to satisfy those who visit the locality that what has been done has been wisely done and ought to be promptly proceeded with.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator from Virginia has made a personal inspection of the locality.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have been to the place and investigated it carefully; I have viewed it from high buildings elsewhere; and I have no doubt about the wisdom of what has been done or the importance of proceeding to consummate the work which has been commenced.

I will say furthermore, Mr. President, that I shall ask the Senate on Monday—of course, in view of the objection of the Senator from Nevada, we can not proceed to-day—to take up this conference report for consideration and dispose of it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to say, in connection with the statement just made by the Senator from Virginia, that if any one of the Senators goes to that particular spot, his first impression will be that the location is a favorable one with reference to the delivery of power and light; and, second, that the general squalor of the neighborhood is such as to make the proposed building an ornament rather than a detriment; but I wish every Senator who goes there to exercise his imagination and to view that water front, as it will be under the plans of the Burnham Commission, which contemplate making that water front, from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing down to the War College, a thing not only of the highest utility but a thing of the highest beauty. Ultimately, if the plans of those artists and architects are not interfered with, we shall have a development there approaching in beauty the Thames embankment in London, the development of the Seine in Paris, and the incomparable development of the Rhine at Dusseldorf, which has transformed that city, originally a Pittsburgh, clouded in smoke and dirt, into one of the most beautiful cities of the world, where the water front has become the point of central interest, although it is not devoted simply to beauty, but is dedicated to utility in the highest degree, every convenience being given for transshipment between boat and car, every mechanical device being utilized for the purpose of cheaply handling freight, and yet the whole thing done in such a way, by the union of engineering and architectural and landscape talent, as to present to the eye an impression of extreme beauty.

I ask every Senator who goes down there and looks at that place to imagine it as it will be, facing Potomac Park, that beautiful park between it and Virginia; that park which is to be highly developed in the future and which will be one of the features of Washington. I also ask Senators then to consider the question in the light of the fact that that point will be the gateway from the South to Washington, and that it is proposed to be defaced by the construction of a building with two stacks, and with possibly four stacks, in the ultimate development of the plans, of the monumental height of nearly 200 feet, and vying with the Washington Monument and the Lincoln Memorial in attracting the eye—the two latter attracting the eye for their beauty and the former for its hideousness.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I hope we may be allowed to proceed with morning business.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not taken the floor at all, except to ask that we continue with the morning business and get through with it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I merely desire to ask to have printed, in connection with the report which I have just submitted, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which I think will be convenient to Senators if it is printed as part of the RECORD. I do not ask that it be read, but I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, in that connection, I also ask permission to have printed selected portions of the hearings before the Committee on the Library and certain letters which have been received from distinguished architects and artists upon this subject.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, that matter is already in print, while the letter to which I have referred is not in print; and I should like to have it printed.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The matter to which I refer is not in the RECORD, and I should like to have it go in the RECORD in connection with the letter which the Senator from Virginia has asked to have printed, in order that the Senate may see them both.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I object to selected portions of the hearings being printed in the RECORD.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move, Mr. President, that I be permitted to insert in the RECORD selected portions of the hearings and also letters from eminent engineers and architects upon the subject of this development.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the request which I made to the Senate has not yet been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the letter referred to by the Senator from Virginia will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 7, 1916.

Hon. THOMAS S. MARTIN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In compliance with your verbal request to Mr. N. S. Thompson, superintendent of the Mechanical Engineering Division of the Supervising Architect's Office, I have the honor to give you the history of the central heating, lighting, and power plant authorized by the sundry civil appropriation act of 1914.

But before proceeding to a detailed history of the various legislative steps in connection with this project I desire to call your attention to the following facts: By some agency unknown to me a persistent effort has been made throughout the country to arouse architects, engineers, civic bodies, and the public generally against what is represented as an attempt to disfigure the natural beauties of Washington. False statements have been published throughout the country to the effect that this power plant is to be erected on the Mall at a point near the White House and Washington Monument. In brief, an audacious effort has been made to arouse resentment against this alleged effort to outrage the esthetic sensibilities of the people of the country. The fact is that the central heating, lighting, and power plant was authorized by the Congress for the express purpose of removing the objectionable conditions referred to.

It will, in fact, achieve that result. The power house will be located on an air line one mile and an eighth from the White House. Because of its lower elevation and the intervening embankment of the trunk-line railroads and the structures of the old and new Bureau of Engraving and Printing it will be invisible from the White House and the White House Grounds. It will be invisible from the streets of the city, except in the immediate vicinity, and from the other Federal buildings in Washington and from the Capitol and any point on Pennsylvania Avenue. It will eventually result in the removal of the smokestacks and chimneys of other Federal buildings and the smoke and gases arising from their individual and in many cases imperfect generating plants. The proposed power house will be equipped with modern smoke-consuming apparatus, which will absolutely do away with smoke nuisances at that point, thereby accomplishing the net result of eliminating the entire smoke nuisances, so far as the Federal buildings are concerned. It will not, however, remove the most conspicuous offenders against Washington's sky line, namely, the two huge black iron stacks of the Potomac Electric Power Co. at Fourteenth and B Streets NW., which rise to an elevation of 200 feet between Pennsylvania Avenue and the Mall. It will not, of course, eliminate or minimize the smoke nuisances from any commercial plants.

As I dictate this letter I am looking from the south window of the Treasury Department, on the second floor, and I can see projecting over the top of the Department of Agriculture Building a small part of the stack of the power plant of that building. It is hardly sufficient to be noticed from this point. That stack is on an elevation considerably higher than the point where the power plant will be erected and is undoubtedly more conspicuous than will be the two stacks from the power plant when built and which are to be only 175 feet high, or 25 feet lower than the objectionable stacks of the Potomac Electric Power Co. I speak of this because it provides a very striking and reliable illustration of the point in controversy. And this stack, together with the stack on the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, which is the largest of the executive group, will be removed when the central plant is in operation.

It is pertinent, I believe, at this point to invite your attention to an alternative proposition which at various times has been presented by the Potomac Electric Power Co. in connection with its proposal to the Government to abandon its own central heating, lighting, and power plant and to make a 10-year contract with the said company. This proposal of the Potomac Electric Power Co. contemplated the enlargement of its power plant at Fourteenth and B Streets NW. This company does not generate steam. It therefore proposed that, if the Government would abandon its own plant, the Potomac Co. would install at the Fourteenth and B Streets plant a steam adjunct, the initial cost of which it was stated would be $300,000. If the plans for the further beautification of Washington, which for several years have been under consideration, are carried into effect, that section of the city in which the Potomac Electric Power Co.'s plant is situated would have to be taken over by the Government, whereupon the Government would be obliged to pay for this plant and the additional investment would be made at that point for supplying the Federal buildings with steam.

Permit me to suggest that if the efforts of art societies and civic bodies were directed to removing the chief offender against the beauty of the Mall and the city of Washington, viz, the conspicuous and ugly smokestacks of the Potomac Electric Power Co. at Fourteenth and B Streets, they would render a genuine public service.

I am not unmindful of the strong protests that have been made to Congress and to the Secretary of the Treasury against the disfigurement of Washington. If such a thing were in contemplation, it should and would justify the resentment and the rebuke of the whole country and my voice would be raised in protest against any such action.

But nothing of this character has been contemplated, and it is a matter of sincere regret that patriotic and well-meaning citizens all over the country have, without any investigation on their part and upon false information, been misled into believing that Congress and the Secretary of the Treasury are seeking to establish a distressing blot upon the face of the National Capital, which, in fact and in truth, they are merely striving to remove.

An act of Congress of April 28, 1904, directed the late Bernard R. Green, then Superintendent of the Library Building and Grounds, to submit at the next session of Congress preliminary plans and estimates of cost of the location, construction, and equipment of a power house for furnishing heat and electric power to the existing and projected Government buildings on the Mall and in the vicinity of the White House. Under date of January 9, 1905, Mr. Green submitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives his report, which was referred to the House Committee on Appropriations, and has been printed as House Document No. 205. Mr. Green in his report to Congress enthusiastically recommended the construction of a central plant to supply the Government buildings west of the Post Office Department, known as the "executive group," and suggested three sites for the location of the power plant: (1) At Fourteenth and B Streets on the Mall; (2) opposite the old Bureau of Engraving and Printing building; and (3) on Water Street at the foot of Fourteenth Street, on the south side of the railroad tracks, the latter being the site on which the Central Heating, Lighting & Power Plant is now being erected.

No action was taken by Congress on Mr. Green's report. The matter of a central plant for the executive group of buildings lay dormant until May 1, 1911, when Secretary of the Treasury MacVeagh appointed a committee consisting of Nelson S. Thompson, chief mechanical and electrical engineer of the Supervising Architect's Office; Capt. C. A. McAllister, engineer in chief of the Coast Guard; and R. H. Chappell, superintendent of machinery of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, to consider and report on plans for a central heating, lighting, and power plant to serve a designated number of buildings in the executive group. Under date of June 1, 1911, the committee was able to submit a report to Secretary MacVeagh for the construction of a plant with a power house located at the present site. Secretary MacVeagh reported the matter to Congress in December, 1911, after having presented the committee's report to President Taft and the Cabinet. A vote of thanks was given by the President and the Cabinet to the Treasury Department's committee.

The Appropriations Committee of the House discussed the matter very fully with Secretary MacVeagh's committee, and as a result directed that a further study be made of the project with a view to enlarging its scope and taking in additional buildings. A second report was submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury in the summer of 1912, and was transmitted to Congress by the Secretary. Hearings on this report were held before the House Committee on Appropriations, and as a result Congress on June 23, 1913, authorized and directed the construction of a central heating, lighting, and power plant on the present site. After full hearings, the best proposal that could be obtained from the Potomac Electric Power Co. was rejected, because it was clear that a considerable saving would be made for the Government by proceeding with the power plant.

The act authorized the employment of experts outside of the Treasury Department, and in order to give the matter the most careful consideration, the firm of L. B. Stillwell & Co., engineers, of New York City, was employed by the Treasury Department to check up the Treasury committee's report. This firm worked on the project for approximately a year, and with one change only, which was of minor importance, concurred with the Treasury Department committee's report. This firm of engineers also prepared the plans and specifications upon which proposals were received and the contract awarded for the plant.

A contract for the erection and completion of the central heating, lighting, and power plant was awarded December 24, 1915, to W. G. Cornell Co., of Washington and New York, and work was immediately started and is now in progress.

Shortly after the award of the contract the attention of the Treasury Department was called to the fact that the drawings and specifications for the power-house structure had not been submitted to the Fine Arts Commission, as required by President Wilson's executive order. This oversight was due to the former Supervising Architect and the firm of engineers hereinbefore referred to, who were handling the project independent of the regular business of the Supervising Architect's Office, and kept the files on the subject independent of the regular office files. These files were not distributed into the regular office files until a few days after the award of the contract for the construction of the plant and about the time that L. B. Stillwell & Co.'s connection with the project was terminated by the department. The information that the Executive order had not been complied with came as a surprise to the department, and immediate steps were taken to submit to the Fine Arts Commission the plans and specifications.

The commission objected first to the smokestacks. At the meetings held before the Senate Library Committee they objected not only to the smokestacks but the construction of the plant on this or any other site, and suggested an impracticable alternate—the enlargement of the Capitol power plant, located in Garfield Park, sufficiently to serve the buildings named in the sundry civil act. An estimate of the cost of enlarging the Capitol power plant to accomplish this object is approximately $1,463,757 (or $4,653 more than the cost of building the new plant), and the project would have many objectionable features. From the engineering side, it would necessitate the transmission of steam 3.4 miles and would burden a plant designed to care only for the legislative activities of the Government.

It can readily be demonstrated mathematically that the smokestacks of the new power plant will not be visible from 99 per cent of the viewpoints referred to by the Fine Arts Commission. I transmit herewith a drawing, with the statement that an observer stationed at any point within the shaded area will be unable to see even the stacks of the new plant.

I transmit also a number of photographs taken at and adjacent to the site of the power plant, showing the conditions now existing there. These photographs show the various lumber wharves, coal wharves, railroad sidings, railroad tracks, and, in general, the character of the surroundings of the selected site. I call your particular attention to the large photograph in which the artist has depicted to actual scale the new power plant building in its exact location. This view is taken from the top of the Washington Monument and it is interesting to note that the only point from which this photograph could be taken to show clearly the power house and its stack is the top of the Monument, approximately 550 feet above the city datum. It might be well to call your attention also to the fact that the height of the stacks as contracted for will be 175 feet above city datum, or practically 30 feet higher than the roof of the new Bureau of Engraving and Printing and 30 feet higher than the roof of the old Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

I transmit also a large map of the city of Washington, on which are shown buildings having independent plants, buildings served by the above, and the location of the new power plant. From this map it will be seen that by extending the tunnel at the old Post-Office Building 1,500 feet it will be possible to connect to the central plant now serving the Interior Department and its attendant group of buildings, and thus shut down that plant; it will also be possible by a tunnel 1,700 feet long to connect the Naval Hospital and the Hygienic Laboratory to the central plant; in short, the location of the plant is ideal to serve the entire number of present and future executive buildings.

The selection of this particular site for the new power house was dictated by the A, B, C's of mechanical and electrical engineering:

First. It is so placed as to be readily and cheaply served with coal, both by rail and by water.

Second. The ashes (one of the most embarrassing features connected with a central plant) can be cheaply and readily removed by rail, water, or carts.

Third. Condensing water in large volumes is available within a few feet and can be handled with the minimum expense for pumping.

Fourth. The plant is fairly within the center of gravity of the load. It is within 800 feet of the buildings that will take 50 per cent of all the steam generated and nearly 40 per cent of all the electricity generated. The greater portion of the buildings to be served are relatively small consumers.

Fifth. The central plant is located on the commercial water front instead of on the Mall on property owned by the Government, at the least conspicuous place in the city of Washington for such a project, and its construction will be a great step toward beautifying that section of the city. The building will be almost entirely hidden from view by the high railroad embankment at this point and the buildings of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The location satisfies the æsthetic feelings of all reasonable men.

Sixth. When the power plant is in operation, it will permit the removal of the present stacks of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and of the Department of Agriculture.

Seventh. The central plant will effect an annual saving to the Government, considering existing buildings only as named in the act, of $177,000. If Congress permits the addition of the office building for the Interior Department, the Red Cross Building, the Johnson-Walker Building, known as the Navy Annex, and the Lincoln Memorial, a further saving of $40,000 per annum will be effected. When the three great departmental buildings named in the act are completed and occupied, a further saving of $45,000 will be effected. In other words, the greater the load, both electric and steam, that is added to the plant, the greater will be the saving, owing to the lower cost of production per unit of steam and electricity.

Eighth. The plant has been designed so that with little expense it may form the necessary steam auxiliary to the hydroelectric plant which, it is safe to say, will be built to harness the Great Falls of the Potomac.

Ninth. The plant will eliminate from the city of Washington 17 smokestacks now existing on Federal buildings, which discharge smoke and gases from their individual plants.

Respectfully, yours, W. G. McADOO, Secretary.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I make the motion to have printed in the RECORD the matter to which I have referred. Do I understand that the Senator from Virginia still objects to the matter being printed in the RECORD?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is a matter of very little concern to me, but I must say I think it would be an unfortunate precedent to have a Senator merely select ad libitum a lot of matter and have it printed, when the Senate knows nothing about what it is. I do not think that is a good practice, and I object.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state what it is. I propose to have printed in the RECORD a statement covering not more than three or four pages, if my recollection is right, of Mr. Cass Gilbert, an emininet architect and a member of the Fine Arts Commission. I propose also to present a brief protest of the American Federation of Arts upon this subject. I also propose to publish four or five letters, each of them covering not more than 400 or 500 words, according to my recollection, from distinguished architects and artists, giving their views regarding this development. I move that the matter referred to be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

The motion was agreed to.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CENTRAL HEATING, LIGHTING, AND POWER PLANT.

[Extract from hearings held before the Committee on the Library, United States Senate, on Feb. 3, 1916.]

STATEMENT OF MR. CASS GILBERT, ARCHITECT, NEW YORK.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, this matter came before the Arts Commission very recently. It was referred, I think, about 10 days ago to the Fine Arts Commission by the Secretary of the Treasury under the usual line of action, and as the commission was not at that time in session, the matter was referred by the chairman of the commission to a subcommittee, of which I was chairman. The subcommittee had before it only the blue prints which were offered by the Secretary of the Treasury. It came to me, I think, on the 21st of January. A meeting of the Commission of Fine Arts was held on Wednesday, the 26th of January. In that interim the subcommittee made an examination of the plans as submitted, and submitted a preliminary report to the Commission of Fine Arts, which is on file in the commission. At the meeting of the commission which was held on Wednesday, the 26th, at the request of the commission, representatives of the Supervising Architect's Office appeared and answered a good many questions which were asked by the commission. These questions are a matter of record, as they were taken down stenographically, and were directed to the general purpose of ascertaining whether such plant at that location could be made less objectionable in the landscape and still efficient; and while the Commission of Fine Arts does not, as I understand, undertake any engineering problems, in a technical sense it was apparently necessary to make some inquiry along engineering lines, in which we do not pretend to be experts, as to other methods of accomplishing the same result by the burning of other fuels and by the use of apparatus in substitution of smokestacks—that is to say, blower apparatus. Incidentally, some questions were asked as to the method of connecting from this plant to the more distant buildings, or to the other buildings, by means of tunnels, and what provision has been made, and whether it was practicable to make a satisfactory connection which would be permanently suitable.

All of that inquiry appears in the records of the Commission of Fine Arts, and is available if you wish to see it.

The conclusion of the Commission of Fine Arts was that the plant at that location would be seriously objectionable, but having respect for the action of Congress, and deeming it not only our function to establish a location, we could only express our great anxiety as to the result if a plant was located at that point. We could, however, within our function, as established by Congress, and as required by our presidential appointments, express our opinion as to the aspect of the plant, as to its appearance, and on that we were unanimous that it would be a seriously objectionable feature in the aspect of the city of Washington.

Beyond that I think there is nothing further for the Commission of Fine Arts to state, except that I will reecho the very grave feeling which we have that a power plant at that location would be seriously objectionable from the standpoint of appearance, and because it would be visible from so many points of view. Coming up the Potomac River, it would be almost the first thing seen. It would be apparent from the War College and from all over the east Potomac Park, where Congress has recently directed the development of a considerable recreation area; it would be immediately visible from the proposed "long-since-past" bridge to Arlington, which has not yet been built, and which might perhaps be left out of consideration; it would be very noticeable from the Lincoln Memorial, the Mall, and from Arlington, from the terraces of the Capitol, and the whole west front of the Capitol.

We find that the width of the main road varies slightly from 80 to 90 feet above the level of the street. The street is about 7 feet above the level of the water—that is, mean level of the water. The smokestacks are, as shown by the drawings, about 16 feet in diameter at the level of the roof. They rise to a height which, from a hasty scaling of the plan, indicate about, I think, 176 feet, but I believed it was stated by the representative of the Treasury Department that the total height of the stack would be 188 feet; but in either case, if 188 feet, that would be 195 feet above the river. Now the Washington Monument, I believe, is 555 feet high. At 195 feet these stacks would be a little more than one-third of the height of the Washington Monument, and as there are four of them, and especially as the location in relation to the railroad and the streets is slightly askew, with the main rectangular line of the street coming down to that point, and with its main axis along from the Capitol to the Monument, and from the White House to the river—these stacks would group themselves in diagonal form, which would present, from these principal points of view, the four instead of simply two, but the fact that there would be an evidence of four is not so important, because in varying points from which it would be seen that perspective would constantly keep changing.

We suggest the possibility of taking the stacks off altogether and using a forced draft. That, according to the response from Mr. Thompson, of the Treasury Department, would, I believe, give some additional expense in operation. It requires additional machinery, and, as I think he expressed it, "Where nature could provide the draft, why do it by mechanical means?" Nevertheless, the forced draft is not beyond possibility and beyond a more or less common practice. It would, however, in that case—am I right in taking so much time, Mr. Chairman? I do not want to be prolix.

The CHAIRMAN. You are perfectly right.

Mr. GILBERT. I am simply giving you some of the things that brought us to our conclusion or point of view. It would, however, probably cause the dissemination of gases to some extent. How far that would go, how far they would travel, or how far they would vitiate the air is a matter for scientists rather than for us and the department. We do not pretend to say.

As to the smoke, I venture to say the engineers would say to you as they have done in other cases to me in my professional relations with buildings—that it is largely a question of firing and of the form of the burning apparatus. In a modern plant, properly handled, there might be comparatively little smoke, but in nearly all plants—and as I look out over the city I see one down there now—there is a considerable volume of smoke. There is some smoke and certainly some gas. That is what the smokestack is for—to carry off these things.

Now, there arose the question as to why it should be erected at that point on the Washington Channel, having in mind that it was probably for the purpose of bringing coal in boats economically to the plant. We were informed by the engineer that while that might at some time become a feature of the plant, that no present provision was made for it. If coal is to be taken economically from barges or vessels, it is probable that you would require an overhead conveyor of some sort; otherwise it would be taken up in the good old-fashioned way by wheelbarrows and in some way transferred to the building. The present layout of the plant provides for the reception of coal from cars. It is dumped and carried to a crusher, then raised and put into the various hoppers or receivers, which convey it down to the boilers.

These questions came up because they had a more or less direct bearing on the height of the plant. It seemed to us probable that the plant could be lowered somewhat. The floor of the main building is about 20 feet above the street—I speak in round numbers and from a general knowledge of the plant. The answer to that is that at one time there was a flood which came some distance above the ground there—about 18 feet, I believe—and it was considered desirable to have the boiler plant above that level, and the precedent in other plants seemed to have established that as a reasonable principle. I think the engineer might have added that it also, as a mechanical proposition, to some extent relieves the boilers of their ashes and cinders, but that might be limited to a little lower level. However, if there was ever a flood, that height of tunnel system would be flooded and it would be difficult, probably impracticable, to force live steam through a flooded tunnel; it would condense too rapidly.

Another point in connection with the tunnel—and we had to make that inquiry—we found that the tunnel crosses the main sewer down on Fifteenth Street. The principal sewer, I understand, in Washington—I will say "we" understand, I do not want to make this as my statement at all—the principal sewer, we understand, is down Fifteenth Street, and, necessarily, would reach the White House; the Treasury Department; the State, War, and Navy Building; the Lincoln Memorial; the Navy Annex; the new Department of the Interior; the new Woman's Memorial Building below the American Republics, etc., and would have to cross from this side to the west side of Fifteenth Street. Hence, you must cross this sewer at some point. We were considering this question of possibly other locations. Our inquiry may have led us a little afield in the matter, but we are keenly anxious to help all we can. Then at what point could there be a crossing, and what is the size of this tunnel? It is found that the size of the tunnel is about 6 feet or 6½ feet wide by about 7½ feet high—I speak from memory and I may be slightly wrong, but it is about those dimensions. Now, add the thickness of the bottom of the foundation or floor of the tunnel and the thickness of the overhead work and sides, then it would produce a tunnel, we will say, approximately 8 by 9½ feet in dimensions. It can not be readily deflected up and down. Huge pipes run through it; live steam will cause expansion. It is a difficult engineering problem. The tunnel must be waterproof—I mean from ordinary surface water. It is an expensive thing to construct a good tunnel, but where that tunnel crosses a sewer it must either go below the sewer or above the sewer or through the sewer. That is obvious.

Now, the depth below the sewer is such that it would be a very expensive operation to put it above the sewer. You have to consider the levels of the grades of the street and keep it below the street grades, and, incidentally, the connections that lead into the sewer alongside of it must intersect the line of this tunnel at some points, so that it becomes a complicated engineering problem and a very difficult one. I do not pretend to speak on behalf of the commission as to the relative merits of the methods by which this difficult problem has been solved, but in the inquiry made by the commission it was said that the piping for the tunnel passes through an iron encasement and crosses the top of the main sewer; and it was, I believe, estimated that it took about 15 per cent off the top of the sewer. Well, if the sewer is ample—much more than ample for its needs—that would probably do no harm, but if the sewer were flooded to its full capacity—and we are not informed as to that, and no question of sewer has been referred to our commission, so we did not go into that question—it would obviously be a check to the flow of water. However, it is highly probable that these skilled engineers have taken all of that into account.

This line of reasoning led us to the question as to whether it was really necessary for this plant to be down in that location. Now, given the supply of fuel by railroad, and eliminating the supply of fuel by water—which apparently is the present program, although in the future it may be changed at that location—might not the whole plant be lowered to a lower level, and might not these conditions be eliminated with forced draft? On inquiry as to this water location, we were told that the purpose of being near the water was to provide water for condensation for the turbines that drive the electric power plant. Well, there is not a large installation of power plant. The generating apparatus is not large but comparatively small; I have forgotten the statement of its capacity; but it is apparently not an important thing in the transmission of electric power. It is now so well established that it is not difficult to carry it any distance you wish. It seemed to us that as, apparently, this location was available or principally desired because it would be near the water for condensation purposes, that water might be supplied from any other location. We even went so far as to inquire whether a reservoir or tank might not be built, the same water being used over again, as in a cooling process, with some sort of aeration or cooling method, and with that added to the expense. No doubt it is a feasible solution of the problem, but as far as our inquiry went we felt we could not charge ourselves with the question of location—that had been settled by Congress—but that we could report that a plant at that location was, in the judgment of our commission, very undesirable from the standpoint of Washington, and we believed—although this may not appear in the report—that a more careful examination of the whole subject of a possible subdivision into two plants for the burning of oil or other fuel, or the burning of gas by a gas-producer plant or other method upon which the skilled engineers of to-day concentrate their attention would bring about a better plant in a location that would be less objectionable.

Now, one word more and I shall have finished. Under the Executive order of the President matters of this kind are supposed to come before the Commission of Fine Arts before final action is taken. Through an inadvertence, apparently, this matter did not come to the Commission of Fine Arts. We had no knowledge of it, officially or otherwise, as far as I know, until about 10 days ago, after the contracts were signed. We make no complaint on that account, but on behalf of the commission I would like to register before your committee the view that the Commission of Fine Arts is not responsible for having passed upon the matter too late, nor could we pass upon it earlier.

I thank you, gentlemen, very much.

STATEMENT OF MR. GLENN BROWN, ARCHITECT, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I appear here representing a committee of Washington that is interested in the development of the city on esthetic lines solely.

Mr. Cass Gilbert has said so clearly what I wished to say that I will confine myself to a very limited number of words.

There is one point with respect to the disagreeable view of these stacks that he did not mention. When the White House was located by George Washington it was located with the idea of having a beautiful view down the Potomac—one of the most charming views that we have in this part of the country—and that was one of the vital reasons for locating the White House where it is. These stacks come up and directly cut off that view from the White House. I think this one fact is sufficient to justify the chimneys being kept down. We feel that this plan of a Federal city, which originated with George Washington and L'Enfant, was a great asset to the country, both financially and in the way of culture and refinement. The Government has spent since Washington's time to the present time approximately $100,000,000 on buildings and grounds. So far it has been harmonized, so that one element fits in with the other, and this will be the first great break in that scheme, and it should be most carefully considered before it is allowed. The value of this park scheme is an asset of the people, and it is an asset that has been wonderfully increased since the Park Commission presented their plans. Gen. Washington's scheme ended with the Washington Monument, which was then located on the shores of the Potomac, and the new reclaimed ground has made it necessary to add to the proposition and to carry the scheme much further. All has been done in harmony with the scheme of George Washington, and we feel that the people who are interested in Washington and Lincoln, and who are interested in the city all over the country, would feel that a great crime had been committed by erecting something here that would destroy the beauty of the city.

We have been studying the question of the advisability of locating it upon other sites, and we feel that it might be joined readily with the Capitol power plant, and if that was too great a run for steam pipes, that they might readily be——

The CHAIRMAN. Not only an immense run for the steam pipes, but an immense run on the Treasury. Mr. Woods's report—in which he estimates; he does not pretend to be accurate at all—makes it nearly a million dollars.

Mr. BROWN. But we go right on spending nearly a million dollars in the other plant. We would save a million dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. How is that?

Mr. BROWN. The other plant would cost nearly $2,000,000—$1,500,000 complete, under present contract. It would cost $1,500,000 to get an acknowledged incomplete plant, on which you would have to add additional features to make it complete. That was to be a plant that would only do part of its work. It would be found inefficient and would have to be completed by additional appropriations.

Now, I am going to ask that the committee hear Mr. Hennen Jennings, who is present, a mining engineer of great eminence, who is also on the same committee and who is vice president of the Federation of Fine Arts, representing 200 art societies throughout the country, and these art societies have in their membership something like 300,000 people, all interested in the city of Washington from the standpoint of beauty. Mr. Jennings is fully capable of discussing the broader topics on the engineering side.

Mr. GILBERT. May I interrupt for just a moment in order to complete something that I omitted to say, which has just been called to my attention? It is in the act provided—

"That the building or buildings of said central heating, lighting, and power plant shall be so located upon said site as to reserve a sufficient area for an asphalt plant for the District of Columbia in the event of such asphalt plant being hereafter authorized."

In reading that act we feel still further apprehension because we are not familiar with what might happen as a result of an asphalt plant, and taking into account that the prevailing winds are said to be from south to southeast, what fumes, smoke, or gases may originate there we do not know, nor could we, in the short time we had, get sufficient information to justify an opinion on that subject.

I thank the committee very much.

EXCERPTS FROM STATEMENT OF LEWIS B. STILLWELL, CONSULTING ENGINEER, NEW YORK.

Mr. STILLWELL. Mr. Chairman, I have come down here at the request of Senator NEWLANDS, but I do not know exactly what he expects me to say. I am ready to answer any questions that may be asked me.

Senator NEWLANDS. I will state, by way of preliminary, that Mr. Stillwell was consulted in some way with reference to this plan. He is an eminent mechanical engineer in New York, and I learned from Mr. Gilbert that he had been consulted with reference to these plans, and I thought it would be advisable to have him here. So I caused him to be summoned by the committee. When he came he expressed some delicacy with respect to appearing, because he regarded himself as a client of Mr. McAdoo, who had, on behalf of the Government, enlisted his services, and he did not know how far he ought to go, and particularly he did not wish to volunteer anything.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the suggestion, under the circumstances, is a very good one. Suppose you ask him any questions you desire to ask.

Senator NEWLANDS. I communicated with Mr. McAdoo over the telephone and told him of Mr. Stillwell's delicacy on the subject, and he told me that of course, Mr. Stillwell was representing the Government, or was employed by the Government, and was at liberty to present his views regarding the subject. I would therefore simply suggest, Mr. Stillwell, that in your own way you go on and state your views regarding the site, regarding the plant itself, the height of the chimneys, their appearance in the landscape, etc.; and anything else that suggests itself to you that will be of public interest.

Mr. STILLWELL. That clears the situation, so far as I am concerned, very satisfactorily.

I should like to say at the outset that my firm has, in this matter, assumed no responsibility in regard to the selection of a site. We have been told that that matter was settled before we were called in; that the plant was to be located at a certain point. Our function has been limited to this: That my firm has supplied a number of expert mechanical and electrical designers who have been placed temporarily on the rolls of the Supervising Architect's Office to make the plans for the mechanical and electrical equipment and for the power house in so far as its structure is directly related to that equipment. For the architectural merits or demerits of that power house we assume no responsibility. That has been in the hands of the Supervising Architect and his representatives.

As to the site, expressing my personal opinion of the matter—and I am glad to have an opportunity to do so—I think this whole matter has been approached here in a way that could not be expected to attain the best economical results. For instance, one of the first things that suggested itself to us when we came here was, why build a new plant? Why not extend the existing plant? Of course, the present plant is farther away from the buildings which are to be heated, and it is possible that were we to figure out the losses in transmitting the steam we might reach the conclusion that it was unwise to transmit it so far. That problem, so far as I know, has never been investigated. It certainly has not been by my associates or myself.

Another question that I asked soon after I came here was this: How is this plant correlated with the possible utilization of the Great Falls of the Potomac, in regard to which Mr. Clemens Herschell made a report for the War Wepartment a year or two ago? And my impression is that up to this time there has been no attempt to consider broadly whether the Great Falls of the Potomac, in cooperation with the steam plant here, or otherwise, could be utilized to advantage in the city of Washington. I make this statement because I want to say that, as an engineer, I think this problem should be studied on broad lines—on lines as broad as those which have been applied by the Arts Commission in its work—and that the whole problem of the supply of electricity for lighting and power purposes and of heating from central stations—if that be the best way—should be laid out now on a plan which can be substantially adhered to for the next 50 or 100 years. The development ought to be systematic and symmetrical in respect of power supply as in respect of architectural development.

Now, as to the plant that has been contracted for, the department has found it necessary to omit a considerable amount of apparatus from its specifications as they were approved by my associate, Mr. Putnam, who represented me here. Unless those omissions are replaced in the near future the plant, in my judgment, would be better left unbuilt. It is presumably the intention of the department to make this replacement in whole or in part so as to make the plant an operative plant.

The CHAIRMAN. They cut it out, I suppose, on account of lack of appropriation.

Mr. STILLWELL. Lack of appropriation, but in doing that there were some highly objectionable changes introduced. For instance, under the contract as let, one of the duplicate steam pipes which were called for by the specifications, will be omitted. Obviously, if you are going to depend upon steam transmitted a distance of nearly 2 miles for the heating of public buildings, you must have a reserve or relay steam pipe to be utilized in case the one normally used goes out of business. Now, in order to omit that auxiliary steam pipe, it becomes necessary for the department to abandon another feature of the plans and specifications as they were drafted by my firm, namely, to give us the idea of taking the boiler plants gradually out of these buildings—the boiler plants of the existing isolated plants, because it becomes necessary to keep them there to fall back on in emergency. That imposes very considerable difficulties in respect of finding a place for the electrical apparatus that is to go in. They have now put them in the engine rooms; and my men who have been here and who have looked over the ground, have told me that it can not be properly done. Personally, I have not looked into the matter. But if the opportunity is afforded to hold up this work until the whole subject could be reviewed in a broad way and solved, as it would be solved in the case of a private corporation undertaking a proposition of similar magnitude, I am not at all sure that there is any engineering necessity for locating the plant at the point selected. I do not wish to say that that is not the point at which the lowest cost of producing the electric unit and steam unit for distribution can be accomplished, but there are many ways of accomplishing a result. That is what an engineer is for. If there is objection to one way the engineer is supposed to find another way of doing it, and I feel perfect confidence, from the general situation, that it could be done.

I have been told that for some reason it was impossible to consider the extension of the existing plant. On the face of it that is the obvious thing to do, and if you are going to leave the present steam plants in the buildings, unless they are causing enough smoke to be a decided nuisance, you can get along very well by supplying the electricity from the present plant with a slight addition to it, as Mr. Woods has said, I believe. When it comes to steam heat from that point, I should not want to express an opinion without going into the matter.

As to the questions of detail that have been under discussion, I do not know that it is necessary for me to discuss them, but with regard to the elimination of the stacks, if the plant is to be left at the location selected, the stacks can be removed, and induced draft used satisfactorily, I believe. The height of the building could be further reduced quite materially by substituting oil for coal as fuel. I have made no figures on the difference of cost, but that could be done.

* * * * * * *

Senator NEWLANDS. Would you regard that site, with reference to the Mall and the general architectural and landscape development there, as objectionable?

Mr. STILLWELL. You are asking me now as a citizen of the United States?

Senator NEWLAND. Yes.

Mr. STILLWELL. I would not have the plant there, Senator. I would place it somewhere else.

EXCERPTS FROM STATEMENT OF HON. BYRON R. NEWTON, ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

* * * * * * *

Senator NEWLANDS. Perhaps it would be well to read into the record at this point the Executive order, dated October 25, 1910. The President directed that—

"Plans for no public buildings to be erected in the District of Columbia for the General Government shall be hereafter finally approved by the officer duly authorized until after such officer shall have submitted the plans to the Commission of Fine Arts, created under the act of Congress of May 17, 1910, for its comment and advice."

The act of Congress directs that—

"It shall be the duty of the commission to advise upon the location of statues, fountains, and monuments in the public squares, streets, and parks in the District of Columbia, and upon the selection of models for statues, fountains, and monuments erected under the authority of the United States and upon the selection of the artists for the execution of same. It shall be the duty of the officer charged by law to determine such questions in each case to call for such advice. The foregoing provisions of this act shall not apply to the Capitol Building of the United States and the building of the Library of Congress. The commission shall also advise generally upon questions of art when required to do so by the President, or by any committee of either House of Congress."

There is another Executive order of November 28, 1913, as follows:

"It is hereby ordered that whenever new structures are to be erected in the District of Columbia, under the direction of the Federal Government, which affect in any important way the appearance of the city, or whenever questions involving matters of art, and with which the Federal Government is concerned, are to be determined, final action shall not be taken until such plans and questions have been submitted to the Commission of Fine Arts designated under the act of Congress of May 17, 1910, for comment and advice."

LETTER FROM ELLIOTT WOODS, SUPERINTENDENT OF THE CAPITOL BUILDING AND GROUNDS.

FEBRUARY 3, 1916.

Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
Chairman Joint Committee on the Library,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR WILLIAMS: I have received your letter of February 1, 1916, regarding the complaints of the Fine Arts Commission with reference to the proposed plant at the foot of Fourteenth Street, to be erected by the Treasury Department to supply heat, light, and power to the various Government buildings already in position and including those to be erected. You state that it has been suggested to you that the light, power, and possibly heat could be furnished from the existing Capitol power plant, and you ask me to make an estimate of the cost for necessary additions to that plant and for other things required to accomplish the purposes suggested. The figures which I present solely at your request, and which are intended to follow the three suggestions made in a personal conversation of day before yesterday, must be considered as approximate, since the consideration of a matter of so great importance requires much more study than this brief intervening period of time could possibly allow. They are presented with the understanding that they are not accompanied by any recommendations on my part, or any intention to be discourteous to the Congress which authorized the construction of the Treasury plant, or to officials connected with the Treasury Department.

It might also be stated that as these figures have been made up purely upon our own personal judgment as to layout, etc., that they may be in some respects widely at variance with figures already made by the technical department of the Supervising Architect's Office. Also, that they have no bearing on the proposition set forth in the amendment to the urgent deficiency bill authorizing the extension in the increase of cost.

I would like to call your attention to the fact that any proposition to change the existing status, operation, or extension of the Capitol power plant should be considered with reference to the specific declarations of the act authorizing the construction of this plant, which will be found on page 31 of the sundry civil act (Public, No. 194) approved April 28, 1904. For your information I am attaching a copy of the document to this letter.

I would like to make a further suggestion, that if Congress should decide to change the existing status, operation, or extension of the Capitol power plant that the functions of this office in any such work should be limited solely to the power plant proper within the limits of its building lines, and that all other operations be conducted solely by the proper authorities of the Treasury Department.

Very respectfully,

ELLIOTT WOODS,
Superintendent United States
Capitol Building and Grounds.

COPY OF THE ACT OF CONGRESS AUTHORIZING THE CONSTRUCTION, DESIGNATION OF PURPOSE, ETC., OF THE CAPITOL POWER PLANT, SUNDRY CIVIL BILL, APPROVED APRIL 28, 1904. (PUBLIC, NO. 194.)

Toward the construction of a building for a heating, lighting, and power plant in connection with the office building for the House of Representatives, the installation of necessary machinery, for labor and material, construction of ducts, heating mains, subways, and traction system connecting the Capitol Building, and for all other appliances and for each and every purpose in connection with all of the foregoing, $130,000: Provided, That said building for heating, lighting, and power plant, when constructed, shall be of sufficient size and capacity to furnish the necessary heat, light, and power for the office building of the House of Representatives, the Capitol Building, the Congressional Library Building, and for such other public buildings which may hereafter be erected on grounds adjacent to the Capitol Grounds at the east of the Capitol Building and facing the same: Provided further, * * *.

LETTER FROM COL. WILLIAM W. HARTS, SECRETARY OF THE COMMISSION OF FINE ARTS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 4, 1916.

Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
Chairman Committee on the Library,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR WILLIAMS: I duly received your inquiry of February 1 for an expression of opinion from the commission as to the advisability of the division of the work to be performed by the proposed new heating, lighting, and power plant at the foot of Fourteenth Street so as to have some of the energy intended to be supplied by that plant furnished by the Capitol heating and power plant and some of it from another plant to be located at a different site than the location contemplated. The carbon copy of your inquiry on the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, who has charge of the Capitol power plant, was also received.

The opinion of the commission has already been voiced in this connection by Mr. Cass Gilbert, of New York, during his appearance before your committee, who has admirably stated the position the commission has taken in this matter. From his statements any arrangement for a heating, lighting, and power plant that will obviate smokestacks in close proximity to the Mall would be decidedly preferable to the disfigurement of the Mall which is now threatened. If the Capitol power plant for any good reason can be shown not to be fully able to take over all the heat, light, and power proposed to be furnished by the new plant, then such portion that can not so be taken over could easily be assumed by an auxiliary plant in an unobjectionable place, possibly somewhere in the general vicinity of the area near the mouth of Rock Creek or in the commercial area south of the Mall and some distance from the river.

Very truly, yours,

WM. W. HARTS,
Colonel, United States Army,
Secretary and Executive Officer.

LETTER FROM HENNEN JENNINGS, VICE PRESIDENT AMERICAN FEDERATION OF ARTS.

2221 MASSACHUSETTS AVENUE,
Washington, February 5, 1916.

Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
Chairman Senate Committee on the Library,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In response to your invitation to present in writing any further facts or thoughts that I desire to communicate in connection with the proposed power scheme, I beg to submit the following:

When giving testimony on February 3, I did not then have opportunity of hearing the testimony of Mr. Stillwell and Mr. Thompson, and I did not know the limitations of their study and estimates. From the testimony I am led to believe that there have been no comprehensive and detailed figures prepared for one central power station that would serve all Government buildings, and I therefore feel justified in making a more definite statement as to the economy of such a plan.

I maintain that, on broad, general principles, the scheme of the Mall power plant is not as economical as one that could be installed at the Capitol power plant. I am not fortified with all figures, but the general facts which have led me to this conclusion are:

First. That the scheme as presented demands the continuous and separate work of three power plants—the plant on the Mall, the power plant at the Capitol, and the power plant at the Government Printing Office.

Second. The handling of coal and ash is or can be made as satisfactory at the Capitol plant, because of the railroad, as at the proposed site. The handling of condensing water may be more expensive, but not to the extent that may be supposed, and may be even more economical, when the excessive cost of condensing water at the Government Printing Office is considered.

Third. It has been stated that, from purely engineering reasons, the proposed site on the Mall is ideal in that it is near the center of gravity of the service to be rendered; but the service here referred to is a partial service, excluding all that portion involved in the legislative group, and also such large users of heat, light, and power as the Government Printing Office and the new city post office. If these items be included in the study, the center of gravity of the system would be much farther east and nearer the Capitol power plant than the Mall site.

Fourth. In maintaining three separate steam plants there must be maintained three separate sets of spare equipment, so that the total installed capacity is greatly in excess of the necessary requirements. By consolidation the spare equipment of the Capitol plant becomes available for general service, and the continuity of service of the Capitol plant would also be protected by the increased number of units available for its service. During construction of such enlarged plant there need be no interference with the continuous and satisfactory operation of the present plant.

Fifth. The great and fundamental difference of cost in a central station will be the reduction of labor cost. At the present time, I have been informed, there are employed at the Capitol plant 33 men; at the Government Printing Office plant 54 men; and, according to the testimony of the experts of the Treasury Department, the new plant is to be installed on the lines of the Capitol power plant. If all of these power plants are worked separately, the number of men on the basis stated would be 120; whereas for a grand central power plant an addition of 34 men to the staff of the Capitol power plant would furnish the necessary operating force and would show a net saving of the services of 36 men. On these lines of thought, a rough estimate can be made as follows of only two items, which amount to nearly $50,000 per year, and there are doubtless others of similar magnitude:

Saving in cost of coal for service of the Government Printing Office, per year	$12,000
Saving in pay rolls, per year	34,000
Total	46,000

I therefore confidently feel justified in making the following recommendations to your committee:

First. That all work on the present Mall power plant be suspended.

Second. That permission be obtained from the different authorities necessary to put a central power station at the present Capitol power plant by enlarging it so that it will have a capacity to deal with all Government public buildings, should it be found by expert advice that at this point the most economical and least objectionable plant could be installed.

Third. That a new set of engineers, in no way committed to the present plan, be employed to make a preliminary survey and estimate of the whole problem, bearing in mind the harmonious carrying out of the plans of the Park Commission.

Respectfully submitted.

HENNEN JENNINGS,
Vice President American Federation of Arts,
Vice President Washington Federation of Arts,
Consulting Engineer.

LETTER FROM REGINALD PELHAM BOLTON, MEMBER OF AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF CONSULTING ENGINEERS.

NEW YORK CITY, February 7, 1916.

Hon. THOMAS S. MARTIN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
Senate Chamber.

DEAR SIR: In regard to the matter of the proposed power house for Federal buildings, and in particular reference to the amendment introduced by Senator NEWLANDS to the urgent deficiency bill and the joint resolution relating to the same subject, I beg to be permitted to record my attendance as a member of a committee of the American Institute of Consulting Engineers in opposition to the proposed establishment of a power and heat generating station on the site in the vicinity of Fourteenth and F Streets.

I am a consulting engineer, in practice in New York City at 55 Liberty Street, in which city I reside and own property. I am a member of the American Society of Civil Engineers, of Mechanical Engineers, and past president of the American Society of Heating and Ventilating Engineers, and other societies and civic organizations. My experience of over 40 years has been largely in steam engineering and problems of power and heat distribution and generation, on which subject I am the author of several books.

I have made a personal inspection of the site of the proposed power building and have given some thought and observation to the location of the various buildings which are to be served therefrom.

I beg respectfully to express the opinion that the site is one upon which the erection of a large steam-generating station is undesirable. Its proximity to the new building of the Bureau of Engraving and to the Washington Monument is such that these structures must become defaced by the products of combustion of such a large plant. The material emitted from the stacks of coal-burning plants, even if "smokeless," comprise besides the large volume of inert gases tar, sulphur, ash, and cinder. The proportions of these elements of discolorization and dirt are not generally known. There are about 100 pounds of tar to each ton of bituminous coal and a variable percentage of sulphur. The ash and cinder average 1½ per cent by weight of all fuel burned. These products are emitted from the top of tall stacks, and "mushroom" over a large area by the action of the winds.

Looking at the grouping of the Federal buildings along the Mall, from the Capitol to the Navy Department, it appears to me that the center of distribution is farther toward the Capitol than the site selected. The fuel supply appears to be equally available at any point along the existing line of trackage. The service to be afforded by the plant being largely that of heating, the proximity of water does not constitute so necessary a factor in economical operation as a strictly power-generating station. The cost of labor in such a plant is the largest element, and if I understand rightly that it is purposed to maintain the existing Government power house at First and E Streets, the duplication of labor costs would be uneconomical.

From my knowledge of steam distribution in other cities and acquaintance with modernized methods of underground construction, I see no reason to doubt that steam could be conveyed to the Federal buildings from a control point over distances of from 10,000 to 15,000 feet. The losses of such long distribution have been greatly reduced by modern improvements.

I beg, therefore, to suggest the desirability of reconsideration of the present course of action and a restudy of the circumstances, and to add that if this course is adopted I shall be happy to afford any information in my power to aid in arriving at a final and satisfactory conclusion in the interests of Washington and of our whole citizenship.

I remain, very respectfully, yours,

REGINALD PELHAM BOLTON.

LETTER FROM W. J. WILZUS, CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE OF AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF CONSULTING ENGINEERS.

WASHINGTON, February 7, 1916.

Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
Chairman Committee on the Library,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the amendment offered by Senator NEWLANDS to the urgent deficiency bill, and also to the joint resolution introduced by him relative to the location of a proposed central heating, lighting, and power plant on the shore of the Potomac River, in the city of Washington. As chairman of a committee of the American Institute of Consulting Engineers, appointed for this purpose, and also as a member of the American Society of Civil Engineers, may I ask your indulgence in presenting to you the very earnest request that the construction of this plant be suspended pending a thorough investigation as to whether or not this is a proper location from both the artistic and the economic standpoint?

An experience of many years with large problems of this nature, first as vice president of the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad in the inception and construction of the Grand Central Tunnel in New York City, and at other points in the East and Middle West, and later as consulting engineer in private practice, leads me to feel that the building of a power station directly in the forefront of the new Lincoln Memorial and surrounding grounds contiguous to the building of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, and visible to a more or less extent from other public buildings and grounds, will be an irreparable and unnecessary injury to the future development of the Capital of the country, and one that will be deplored by the entire Nation.

My associates on the committee, who join with me in this appeal, are among the best-known engineers of the country. Mr. Ingersoll is a consulting engineer in private practice, and was formerly chief engineer of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, and later chief engineer of the bridge department of the city of New York; Mr. Ralph D. Mershon, a widely known consulting electrical engineer, is a past president of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers; Mr. Charles W. Leavitt is probably the best-known landscape architect and engineer in the country; and Mr. Reginald Pelham Bolton is a prominent consulting engineer in the heating and ventilating field.

I have given their records and my own somewhat in detail as indicating the breadth of experience which, I hope, will be taken as adding somewhat to the weight of our opinion that the best interests of the country will be served by a suspension of work on the power plant plant until the question of its site can be given a thorough investigation, with the object of placing it where no injury will be done to the effect that is expected to be produced by the millions of dollars that have been and are to be expended in the enhancement of the beauty of Washington.

Yours, respectfully,

W. J. WILZUS,
Chairman Committee of American
Institute of Consulting Engineers.

LETTER FROM J. LAWRENCE MAURAN, PRESIDENT, AND BURT L. FENNER, SECRETARY, OF THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF ARCHITECTS.

FEBRUARY 7, 1916.

Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
Chairman Committee on the Library,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the amendment to the urgent deficiency bill offered by Senator NEWLANDS and to Senate joint resolution 92, both in regard to the proposed central heating, lighting, and power plant, the American Institute of Architects, through its president and secretary, desires to place itself on record as believing that the amendment and the resolution should be adopted.

Their effect would be to secure a thorough reconsideration of the proposal to erect a power plant in a location where it would, we believe, be detrimental to the future development of the Capital City, in which the pride of the entire country is centered.

If such an examination should determine that the site has been well chosen, those who now fear that the opposite is the case would be reassured. If, on the other hand, a way should be found for removing the plant to another and less objectionable site, surely the country would be grateful. In any case, the adoption of the amendment and the resolution would but delay, for a period, the actual work of construction.

In the words of one of the founders of our democracy, a confessed "enthusiast in the subject of the arts," Thomas Jefferson, the loss of time should not be weighed "against the comfort of laying out the public money for something honorable, the satisfaction of seeing an object and proof of national good taste, and the regret and mortification of erecting a monument to our barbarism, which will be loaded with execrations as long as it shall endure."

Respectfully,

JOHN LAWRENCE MAURAN, President.
BURT L. FENNER, Secretary.

LETTER FROM CHARLES W. LEAVITT, CIVIL AND LANDSCAPE ENGINEER.

FEBRUARY 8, 1916.

Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The American Institute of Consulting Engineers has appointed me as one of a committee to consider the location of the new power house at Washington, and in so doing I have come to the following conclusions:

From the little study which I made of the situation, which I made in a rather hurried trip yesterday, I believe that it would be wise to investigate from an engineering standpoint the advantages of the two plants contemplated over one plant, which might be had by combining the two plants and locating them on the site of the present power plant of the Capitol.

The contemplated location of the new power house would be in full view of incoming trains from the South, which is a point well worth considering.

Also, if the power house is located where contemplated, great quantities of smoke will roll over the parks, and the chimneys, if not the whole structure, will be in full view of those seeking recreation in the parks along the water front. They also will be in full view of the Capitol and the White House.

It seems to me that these are matters which should cause the committee to pause and consider whether or not this location will not frustrate the work of tremendous expense which has already taken place with the sole object of the beautification of Washington.

Very truly, yours,

CHARLES W. LEAVITT.

EMPLOYMENT OF ADDITIONAL CLERK.

Mr. KERN obtained the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KERN. I will be pleased to yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution 81, which provides for an extra clerk to a committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 81), which had been reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, with an amendment, in line 3, after the word "for," to strike out "the balance of the present fiscal year" and insert "two months," so as to read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard be authorized to employ an additional clerk at a salary of $100 per month for two months, the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, what is the necessity for immediate action upon this resolution? Why should it be passed to-day?

Mr. McCUMBER. The necessity is that the clerk is needed.

Mr. BRYAN. What is the committee?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

Mr. BRYAN. I object, Mr. President. That committee has never had a meeting in the history of its existence.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to call the Senator's attention, if he will allow me a moment, to the fact that the employment of the clerk is only to cover a period of two months. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate has passed upon the resolution.

Mr. BRYAN. Let it come up in the regular way.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I appreciate that the resolution goes over on the objection of the Senator from Florida. The Senator has not objected to similar resolutions which have been presented for Senators on the other side, and, of course, that undoubtedly made a vast difference to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask a question before the matter is disposed of. Was this resolution referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and was it approved by that committee?

Mr. McCUMBER. It was.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, it seems to me, it ought to go through.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate passed upon this resolution and upon the one for the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] at the same time. We have limited the time of employment of the extra clerk to two months in each of the resolutions.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How many clerks has the Senator now who is chairman of the committee?

Mr. SMOOT. The committee has three clerks.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This resolution gives four?

Mr. SMOOT. The extra clerk is to be employed for a period of only two months.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I do not feel at this time like giving my consent to adding another employee to a committee which has never held a meeting. Some of the important committees of the Senate have only four clerks, and why should a committee which has not had a meeting in the history of the Government have four clerks? I object to unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution, even though the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate have recommended it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say, on behalf of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, that the committee took into consideration the amount of work a Senator is called upon to do, rather than the fact that he is the chairman of any particular committee.

Mr. BRYAN. If the Senator from North Dakota needs another clerk, I will vote to give it to him; but let us do it in that way. Let him say he needs another clerk, and I will vote to give it to him.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that is exactly what I said.

Mr. BRYAN. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator desires to object, I am not going to go into the matter at length and make any fight here. His objection, of course, carries the resolution over. I say that for two months I need more than that force, and that I am to-day paying from my own pocket for two extra clerks whom I am now employing to do the work. If the Senator desires that I shall pay for a third one myself, I shall do it; but I am not asking for anything that is not proper under the circumstances. I submitted the question to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and the committee determined that for a couple of months it would allow the extra clerk.

Now, I have presented my case, and I have nothing more to say. I notice that a number of similar resolutions have passed through heretofore without encountering the scrutinizing eye of the Senator from Florida, and I assumed, as this was a case where I knew there was a just demand for it, that the Senator would have no objection to having this clerk authorized for the little time of two months.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I want the Senator from North Dakota to understand that my objection is not intended to keep him from having whatever clerical help is necessary. I would make the same objection to a request for four clerks on any committee that never meets. I will join with any Senator to give him whatever help he needs. I think we had better do it in that way rather than to adopt the subterfuge of voting an extra clerk to a committee that never has had a bill before it.

This is not the first time I have said that, Mr. President. There are 75 committees of the Senate, and two-thirds of them never meet. I say it is absurd to ask that a committee which has no business should have the same number of clerks as great committees that have to meet every day and have bills referred to them every day.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to ask the Senator if he thinks he could get along without any clerks if he did not happen to be the chairman of a committee? The work is the work of a Senator. The work is the work of the Government. There are a number of Senators, perhaps, who are not the chairmen of any committees. Therefore they are not seeking clerks through committees, but they have to do their work, and if they can not do it with their present force they must either employ the force themselves or let the Senate employ it.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me ask the Senator a question. Does the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard need an additional clerk?

Mr. McCUMBER. The chairman of that committee needs the clerk or he would not have asked for it, nor would he have allowed a resolution for that purpose to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. BRYAN. But does the Senator or the committee need the clerk?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator who is the chairman of the committee needs that assistance.

Mr. BRYAN. Has a bill ever been referred to that committee?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, I do not know. Perhaps the chairmanship of that committee might have been held by the Senator from Florida for a number of years past. It is a committee which, together with six or seven others, is accorded to the minority.

It does not make any difference whether the particular committee under discussion has bills referred to it or not; the work is the same. We never question the right of a Senator to have clerical assistance, and that is the only ground on which I am putting the request. I have told the Senator frankly what the situation is. We have never questioned the right of a Senator to have at least a portion of what is necessary.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I have questioned not the right of a Senator to have clerical assistance, but the right of these useless committees to have it. When the Democratic Party came into power I had the privilege of offering in the Democratic caucus a motion to do away with all these useless committees and to give to each Senator the help he needed. The caucus agreed to that plan of action; but because of these demands that have been made here all along, and because the rules provide for about 50 useless committees, it never has been acted upon in the Senate.

Now, the Senator from North Dakota says this committee ought to have four clerks, and he has referred to the committee of which I am chairman. Mr. President, it is a hard-working committee and a committee that considers bills that are of great importance to the country; but it has only four clerks, although three-fourths of the bills that are introduced here, outside of the pension bills, go to that committee. If it can get along with four clerks, doing work every day, it does seem to me that a committee like the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, which has never held a meeting and has never had any business referred to it, can get along with three. Every Senator in this Chamber now has three clerks.

Mr. McCUMBER. And some four.

Mr. BRYAN. Some four.

Mr. McCUMBER. Some five; some six.

Mr. BRYAN. Some may have five; some may have more. I am not saying that some of them do not have more than they are entitled to have, but if we go on in this slipshod fashion we will all have more than we ought to have.

As I think I have stated a number of times, I am for revising the membership of committees, and for doing the thing in a straightforward way. I want Senators to have the clerks they need, and the Senate wants Senators to have them. The present majority of the Senate did something for the Republican minority that never had been done when the Democrats were in the minority. We made no difference. Every Senator in the minority before 1913 had to get along with two clerks. When the Democratic Party came into the majority, because of the statement by Members of the Republican minority that they ought to have three clerks each the Senate gave each Senator three clerks.

I am not complaining of that. That is what ought to have been done if they needed the clerks. I think, sir, that each Senator ought to have whatever help he needs for his official work, and I will go as far as any man, if three are not enough, to give him four. But let us stop this business of having two-thirds of our committees made up so that people will say, and can say, that those committees are not established to do any work of the Senate; they never do any work of the Senate; they are established for the purpose of giving extra clerical help.

I am not objecting because the Senator from North Dakota made the request. I would have objected if any Senator in this Chamber had made the request.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRYAN. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope the Senator from Florida, upon reflection, will not insist upon his objection. The Senator from North Dakota has said that for this period of two months he needs an additional clerk. In an assemblage of gentlemen, as we are here, the Senator's word ought to be sufficient; so I hope the Senator from Florida will withdraw the objection and let the resolution go through.

Mr. BRYAN. No, Mr. President, I am not going to withdraw the objection and let the resolution go through in its present shape. In view of the statement of the Senator from North Dakota, if he will amend the resolution so as to provide that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] shall have one additional clerk, I will vote for it.

I am not going to sit here and vote to give an additional clerk to a committee that everybody knows never has had a meeting. I think it is time for us to get away from that bad practice. That is as far as I am willing to go. If the Senator will amend his resolution so as to provide that an extra clerk shall be given to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], I will withdraw any objection.

Mr. President, we did that very thing for the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], and we did it in a manly, straightforward way. Because of his affliction, he needed a man to go about with him; and the Senate voted a man for Senator GORE. It did not vote a man for the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard or the Committee on the Transportation and Sale of Meat Products.

I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that this is a matter of principle with me. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has pending now before the Senate a resolution on the subject, which ought to be given very serious and careful consideration, and which in theory is correct. It is a resolution to amend the rules so as to give to each Senator the clerical force he needs individually, to abolish useless committees, and to give to the real committees of the Senate the clerical force they need. That is the right way to go about it.

In order that I may not be misunderstood, I move to strike out all of the body of the resolution, and to substitute the following words——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, does the Senator withdraw his objection?

Mr. McCUMBER. The resolution either ought to be before the Senate or away from it, or the objection ought to be withdrawn. I do not see how the Senator can object and at the same time move to amend the resolution.

Mr. BRYAN. I will withdraw the objection temporarily, then; and I move to amend——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. BRYAN. I can not yield just yet. I have the floor. I move to amend the resolution so that it will read:

Resolved, That the senior Senator from North Dakota——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri will state it.

Mr. STONE. While there is an objection pending to the consideration of the resolution it seems to me it can not be amended, and it seems to me it can not be discussed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida has withdrawn his objection.

Mr. BRYAN. I withdrew it on the condition——

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Florida says he withdrew it temporarily.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a moment ago I interrupted the Senator from North Dakota. I did not understand this proposition at the time. I merely noticed that the chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was not in the Chamber, and I wanted to ask the question which I did ask.

I have ceased to belong to that committee, as the Senator from Florida knows. I did not know that this was a proposition to give the Senator from North Dakota four clerks. As chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate for a long time, I had but three clerks. As chairman of the Committee on the Library, which meets every week—or is supposed to meet every week, at any rate—I never have had more than three. I have as much work to do as the Senator from North Dakota. A great many other Senators have as much.

Now, as to the proposition made by the Senator from Utah——

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I have not yielded to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS (continuing). That you give to each Senator what he needs——

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, have I the floor? Just a minute. I have not finished.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just one moment. Let me finish this sentence, and I will be through.

As to the proposition to give each Senator what clerical service he needs, that will not do, because a modest Senator will not claim very much and another one who takes himself very seriously and thinks his work is very important may claim from five to six or seven. If you say that you shall give to each one the clerical assistance he needs, then immediately arises the question who is to determine what he needs? Is he to do it himself? The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] rather takes the position that he is; that in an assemblage of gentlemen, the minute a gentleman says, "I need four clerks, or five clerks, or six clerks," they should be given to him. I do not think we can run the Senate on that basis.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I withdraw my objection and move to strike out the words "Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard" and insert "senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]," so that the resolution will read:

Resolved, That the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] be authorized to employ an additional clerk at the salary of $100 per month for two months, the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, when I asked the courtesy of the Senator from Indiana to yield to me, I assumed that there would be no discussion whatever of the resolution, and therefore I imposed upon his generosity. I simply wish to say now that I will not ask for the present consideration of the resolution and accept an amendment that is based upon a mere caprice, to meet the views of some one, without reference to its purpose. If the Senate wishes to vote upon the subject later, it can do so.

BIRTHDAY OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, on October 1, 1902, at Lincoln City, Ind., there was dedicated a monument just then placed at the grave of Abraham Lincoln's mother. On that occasion the governor of Indiana was present and 10,000 people, including the school children and veterans of the Civil War for miles around. At the dedication Gen. John C. Black, of Illinois, delivered an oration, a short one, but a beautiful piece of composition, which, I think, should be preserved through the medium of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Standing by the grave of Abraham Lincoln's mother, Gen. Black said:

A great throng is here to-day who have come to testify their affection for Nancy Hanks Lincoln, and who have singled out this one woman for this unusual honor. Well might her simple spirit, if recalled to this scene, bid us leave her slumber unbroken, and her ashes return again to the urn of oblivion. Well may all inquire why, after these many years, this stately concourse? Why the recall of these aged companions? Why this muster of these heroic veterans? Why these honored women? Why should the great State itself turn back through the loftiest century of time, to stand in the person of its governor and officials, in splendid ceremony about a wilderness grave? And with solemn voice we answer, "That justice may be done; that wrong may be righted; that truth, eternal as the reign of God, may be established." We come, O woman and mother, here to build our memorial to thee! Thine earthly garments were damp with the dews of the wilderness! Thy feet were torn by the thorns of thy pathway! Thine eyes were dimmed by the tears of thy travail! But in thine arms thou didst bear, and at thy bosom thou didst nourish the babe of thy sacrifice, the child of thy toil—him the master of his time—the beloved of centuries to be—the servant of justice and the liberator of the oppressed. And so, for thine own sake and for thy child's sake, we are here to do this fitting honor. I have often wondered whether this pair, Thomas and Nancy, fled from the fate of slavery, with conscious knowledge of its baleful power, or whether their flight was simply from conditions not understood, but not the less intolerable. But be that as it may, "He rose and took the young child and his mother and departed thither."

Here in Indiana they rested. Here in Indiana she gave that child, in the simple cabin now gone to ruin, his first lessons. Here, in his father's presence, she sowed the seeds of truth and justice, afterwards to mature a mighty harvest. Here she stood and pointed upward, little comprehending, if at all, the future that awaited. We can not say she did not see anything of that future. What mother who bends over an American babe was ever wholly blind to the possibilities? Duller, indeed, than any mother must she have been not to have known that her cabin-born child had not equal advantages with the child of the plantation. Less than a mother would she have been had she not rebelled at the distinction and sought to obviate it. But, in any event, here she came, and having placed his feet on freedom's soil she yielded her blameless life back to the grave. And this is all her story—a short and simple annal of the poor.

But the years passed on. The Nation was in the throes of a great war for its prolonged existence. At its head was the child of this woman and over against him the child of the plantation. The struggle was to decide, as the chieftain said, whether a nation dedicated to liberty could live or whether a government "of the people, for the people, and by the people" should perish from the earth. Was the leader equal to the task? Could he save the Nation for righteousness and liberty? Whence was his training, and who had laid the moral foundations on which he should stand in this awful struggle? We see the son bowed by a weight of cares such as has rarely fallen on human shoulders. He wielded the power and enjoyed the affection of a great people. Armies moved at his command and navies obeyed his orders. Disasters, recurring, filled the earth with loudest clamors against him. Calumny belied him and hate spied upon his every act. But ever, louder and louder, sounded the bugles of advancing victory. In the midst of this vast strife, in the stress of public trials and the pain of personal woes, we hear the worn and weary President, matchless orator, great civic leader, emancipator, patriot—he whose lips spoke down rebellion and liberty to the stars—we hear him declare: "All I am or may be I owe to my sainted mother." High testimony this, and most exalted witness.

And at last the great war drew to its triumphant close. Its mightiest actor, too, approached his end. Behold him surrounded by his friends and advisers. He is telling of all that he hopes for the land of his love. On him, so speaking, fell the melancholy which he had inherited from his mother, and he tells of the dream, which, often recurring, had always been a harbinger of some great, grave event. Before victory or before disaster had that dream come to him—"A shadowy ship bears me rapidly toward a shadowy shore." I sometimes fancy that on the dark barge of the President's dream there waited for him, standing midst the dense throng of his dead guards and statesmen who had sailed before, and who had returned to meet him, this woman, this wilderness queen, this tallest and stateliest of them all—this mother whom to-day we honor. The world beyond has its own mysteries. So to the living they will ever continue. And so we leave them—one here in Indiana, two in Illinois, in the grasp of the Union, their lives preserved—we leave them, son and father and mother, in equal honor and in eternal peace.

Mr. President, this being the anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, I move, out of respect to his memory, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 14, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 12, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, our heavenly Father, above all, through all, and in us all, ever working in and through Thy children for the advancement of Thy plans and purposes, we thank Thee that great men, great thoughts, great deeds live not only in the pages of history, in monuments of bronze and granite, but in the light of advancing civilization that posterity will honor itself in honoring its great men in song and story.

To-day our heart turns to one of the world's greatest men and would pour itself out in gratitude to Thee for the life, words, and deeds of Abraham Lincoln, an apostle of liberty and the preserver of our beloved Union. A martyr to the cause he cherished, may his example be an inspiration to American patriotism, American liberty, American principles. O better that a million men should die than that one hallowed principle should perish. A patriot, a statesman, a philanthropist, a Christian, "Long may his memory live and longer yet his deeds inspire our free-born sons with patriot fire." Thou, too, "Sail on, O Ship of State! Sail on, O Union, strong and great!" And songs of praises we will ever give to Thee, God of the ages, whose glory shines through the good and the true and poured itself out in love on the hill of Calvary that we might have life and that we might have it more abundantly. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 3391. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of Indians occupying railroad lands in Arizona, New Mexico, or California," approved March 4, 1913.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] will read President Lincoln's Gettysburg address.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri, from the Clerk's desk, read Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, delivered at the dedication of the cemetery at Gettysburg November 19, 1863, as follows:

"Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new Nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

"Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that Nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battle field of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that Nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

"But, in a larger sense, we can not dedicate, we can not consecrate, we can not hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this Nation under God shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth."

[Prolonged applause.]

The SPEAKER. Under the special order the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WHEELER] has 20 minutes in which to address the House. [Applause.]

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, "If we could first know where we are, and whither we are tending, we could better judge what to do and how to do it."

If Abraham Lincoln were living to-day and occupied the same position he once occupied on the floor of this House, he no doubt would find ample occasion for uttering those same words which were included in an address delivered by him before the Illinois convention in 1858.

To me there is in the annals of liberty no greater day than February 12, 1809. On that day Abraham Lincoln was brought into the world. And on this, the one hundred and seventh anniversary of his birth, I, as a Representative chosen by the good people of the congressional district wherein he lived, consider it not only a duty but an honor to be able at this time and in this place to join in the grateful acknowledgments of a Republic to which he "gave the last full measure of devotion."

We can not honor, but we can show that we still cherish his memory by adding our tributes to that wealth of veneration and gratitude which the world this day extends to the savior of the Union and the emancipator of a race.

To all who have had the pleasure of such a rich investment of their time as to study the character and works of Abraham Lincoln, his ever-towering greatness appears more apparent. The choicest literature by master minds has been inspired by the life of Lincoln, and he would indeed be a bold man who would deem himself capable of presenting anything original as to his character and his acts.

The mellow temperament of this backwoods boy of Kentucky, enriched by the hardships of humble birth, poverty, and toil, has made his life a veritable garden for research.

As a rail splitter, as a lawyer, as a politician, as a husband and father, and, finally, as the head of a nation, his every word and deed has been subjected to the scrutiny of historians and students. And it can be truthfully said that as new generations read of his works and study Abraham Lincoln's life the more remarkable appears his character.

Therefore it is but fitting that I here repeat the words of Henry Ward Beecher, which he spoke at the death of Abraham Lincoln, when he said:

Not Springfield's, but Illinois'; not Illinois', but the Nation's; not the Nation's, but the world's, is this man.

While the name of Lincoln has most frequently been associated with the preservation of the Union and the emancipation of the slaves, I shall not dwell upon his conduct as an official, save to reveal certain principles he then expounded and which may prove very interesting at this time.

LINCOLN ADVOCATED NECESSARY PREPAREDNESS.

Lincoln subordinated all other considerations to the one great object of saving the Union. With his usual insight into human nature, he foresaw the joy with which the privileged classes in society would hail the dismemberment of the Republic.

He saw all too clearly that the western continent would become the prey of the Old World powers if the Union were not maintained "one and indivisible."

In a letter to Gov. Seymour, Lincoln said:

Shall we shrink from the necessary means to maintain our free Government which our grandfathers employed to establish it and our own fathers have already employed to maintain it? Are we degenerate? Has the manhood of our race run out?

Was not the saving of the Union the greatest act of preparedness in history?

A chorus of rejoicing among the scions of the monarchies of Europe greeted every defeat of the Federal arms, and in our darkest hours we heard but one expression from those enemies of free institutions: "The bubble Republic has burst."

This premature rejoicing was but the prelude to a well-planned program of conquest of the American people by the monarchies of the Old World.

But the preservation of the Union sounded the death knell of all such aggressive campaigns.

HIS SPIRIT ROSE SUPREME.

And during the hour of his greatest trials, when he was subjected to countless insults, indignities, and humiliation, often at the hands of those whom he had considered his supporters, and even from the members of his own official family, his spirit rose supreme. Seward, on a famous occasion, and Chase, repeatedly, were guilty of acts savoring so much of disloyalty to their chief that it is almost incomprehensible how he could have ignored them.

But he overlooked and forgave all. Not one word of personal resentment or rebuke can be found in all his writings and speeches. This fact alone has inspired countless orators and writers to proclaim his freedom from the faults and failings of ordinary humanity.

Feeling that his mission was to save the Union, he unselfishly subordinated all other considerations to that one supreme object. If a man appeared best adapted to a certain work, Lincoln assigned him that work and kept him on it regardless of how he himself was treated by that man.

HIS LETTERS AN INSPIRATION TO THE YOUNG.

It has been said that Franklin's autobiography is the most helpful book a young man could read to gain inspiration and aid in the struggle to make his way in this world, but without disparaging what Franklin may have said, there is in certain letters of Lincoln more valuable advice than can be found anywhere. He had known all the discouragements and rebuffs which attend the efforts of a poor young man, and could therefore speak with the voice of experience and authority.

With what sanity and charity he could advise those who, amid almost insurmountable obstacles, struggle to make their way in the world, may best be shown by a letter he wrote to William H. Herndon July 10, 1848, which was as follows:

DEAR WILLIAM: Your letter covering the newspaper slips was received last night. The subject of that letter is exceedingly painful to me, and I can not but think there is some mistake in your impression of the motives of the old men. I suppose I am now one of the old men, and I declare on my veracity, which I think is good with you, that nothing could afford me more satisfaction than to learn that you and others of my young friends at home are doing battle in the contest, and endearing themselves to the people, and taking a stand far above any I have ever been able to reach in their admiration.

I can not conceive that other old men feel differently. Of course I can not demonstrate what I say, but I was young once, and I am sure I was never ungenerously thrust back. I hardly know what to say. The way for a young man to rise is to improve himself every way he can, never suspecting that anybody wishes to hinder him. Allow me to assure you that suspicion and jealousy never did help any man in any situation. There may sometimes be ungenerous attempts to keep a young man down, and they will succeed, too, if he allows his mind to be diverted from its true channel, to brood over the attempted injury. Cast about and see if this feeling has not injured every person you have ever known to fall into it.

Now, in what I have said I am sure you will suspect nothing but sincere friendship. I would save you from a fatal error. You have been a laborious, studious young man. You are far better informed on almost all subjects than I have ever been. You can not fail in any laudable object unless you allow your mind to be improperly directed. I have somewhat the advantage of you in the world's experience, merely by being older, and it is this that induces me to advise.

TOWERED ABOVE HIS ADVERSARIES.

Another striking trait of his character is revealed by Nicolay and Hay, when, after describing the duel with Gen. Shields, they say:

Although the rest of his life was passed in hot and earnest debate, he never again descended to the level of his adversaries, who would gladly enough have resorted to unseemly wrangling. In later years it became his duty to give an official reprimand to a young officer who had been court-martialed for a quarrel with one of his associates.

The reprimand is probably the gentlest recorded in the annals of penal discourses, and it shows in few words the principles which ruled the conduct of this great and peaceable man. It has never before been published and it deserves to be written in letters of gold on the walls of every gymnasium and college:

"The advice of a father to his son, 'Beware of entrance to a quarrel, but being in, bear it that the opposed may beware of thee,' is good, but not the best. Quarrel not at all. No man resolved to make the most of himself can spare time for personal contention. Still less can he afford to take all the consequences, including the vitiating of his temper and the loss of self-control. Yield larger things to which you can show no more than equal right; and yield lesser ones, though clearly your own. Better give your path to a dog than be bitten by him in contesting for the right. Even killing the dog would not cure the bite."

Who can estimate the good which the rising generation may reap from the study and contemplation of such a noble character? The lesson of his early struggles remains an inspiration and encouragement to the youth of all climes and ages. In view of the educational advantages enjoyed by those of to-day, it is difficult to appreciate the obstacles which he met and conquered. His life is one long confirmation of the truth, that genius is a combination of untiring application and unquenchable ambition.

Possessing none of the advantages of a college education, he nevertheless towered intellectually above all the statesmen of his time. This may have been lost sight of by many owing to the fact that we have learned to dwell on his all-comprehending heart, rather than on his superb intellect.

For his heart was as tender as a woman's. [Applause.] His public and private life is one long record of acts of mercy. His inability to resist the appeal of a father or mother in behalf of a soldier boy sentenced to death for some default of duty kept him in constant trouble with his Secretary of War. But how many now bless his name for those acts of mercy! [Applause.]

LIVING TESTIMONIALS OF HIS CHARACTER.

Before concluding my remarks I should forego a great pleasure if I failed to voice the deep satisfaction of the citizens of Springfield that they are still blessed with the presence and companionship of two men who were honored by Lincoln with his deepest confidence and lasting friendship. I refer to Mr. John W. Bunn and Dr. William Jayne. Through the conversations and reminiscences of these estimable gentlemen we are brought into direct contact with the spirit of the great emancipator, and those who visit the home of Lincoln would find it a rare and never-to-be-forgotten privilege to meet these patriarchs, who, by reason of their long and intimate acquaintance with him, can picture the man more vividly than could any printed page.

An apostle of truth, an apostle of mercy, an apostle of liberty, language is pitifully poor when we seek to describe him.

Future ages will produce great statesmen and patriots, but the "typical American" has come and gone. With ever-widening circles on the sea of time, his fame will grow. In all ages the devotees of liberty will repair to his tomb as to a shrine. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. Under the special order, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] will address the House for 20 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Speaker, fivescore and seven years ago to-day the star of destiny shone resplendent over the cradle of an infant boy who, in the years to follow, was to be acclaimed by history as one of America's grandest contributions to the world's heritage of great and noble men. On that day, in a cabin home, amid the hills of Kentucky, Abraham Lincoln was born, and on this anniversary of his birth the memory of that great and Godlike life thrills the soul of every American, giving him an inspiration of true nobility. [Applause.]

Abraham Lincoln! What a flood of mighty memories is awakened by that name. What a glorious panorama of patriotic achievement it presents to view. How it seems to fathom the very depths of duty and devotion, the innermost springs of sympathy and of sorrow. As we pronounce it reverently to-day the trials and tragedies and triumphs of the Nation's supremest struggle pass again in review before us and, rising above the stress and strife of conflict, grand and majestic, like some tall cliff "that midway leaves the storm," we behold the one great central figure of that epoch of heroism, the one never-failing beacon light of national patriotism—our Lincoln—the world's Lincoln. [Applause.]

As I attempt to-day to pay tribute to a personality so great, a character so grand, so complex, and yet so simple, I am overwhelmed with a sense of my inability to do even partial justice to his name and fame. I shall content myself, therefore, with a brief reference to a few of his great traits of character which I believe have left a profound and lasting impression upon the American mind.

Why is it that no other name in the long roll of distinguished American statesmen stirs the heart of the Nation so deeply as that of Abraham Lincoln? Orators never weary of singing his praise, and hearers never tire of listening. Books on Lincoln multiply each year, and interest in them never flags. Every trivial relic of his homely life, every scrap of his writing, every prophetic saying, every jest, every anecdote, is treasured to-day by the people and bequeathed by them "as a rich legacy unto their issue."

It is not enough to say that Lincoln was a wise and patriotic President who died a martyr to a great cause. We have had other wise and devoted Presidents, and he is not the only martyr, but there is only one Lincoln. Washington we reverence, Jackson we admire, Lincoln we love. His memory is enshrined more deeply in the heart of the Nation than that of any other man, and there is none so close as he to the source of tears and of emotion.

This can not be explained by the fact that Lincoln rose by manly effort from the humblest ranks of backwoods life to the highest position in the gift of any people. It can not be accounted for by the fact that he was a noble embodiment of that splendid spirit of self-reliance that is bred of generations of lonely struggle under the shadow of the forest primeval. It is not even because he signed the great proclamation of emancipation.

These things are a part of the reason for the esteem in which we hold Lincoln, and so are his inexhaustible humor, his intense earnestness, his tireless industry, his honesty and fairness, his courage, and his steadfastness of purpose. His homely and unaffected words and ways had something to do with his popularity, and so had his sturdy common sense. But not all of these sterling traits could make a Lincoln without something additional; nor is the secret revealed by naming what is usually regarded as the crowning trait of his magnificent character—the fact that he always sought the right as God gave him to see the right, and that he devoted his life to a steadfast pursuance of it when once he was convinced he had found it. This will explain much, but it will never explain the flood of tender emotion that wells up from American hearts at mention of his incomparable name.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the true secret of our love for Lincoln was his own love for his fellow man. [Applause.] In his ungainly, giant form there was a heart of infinite human sympathy, and this it was that illumined all his other traits of greatness and has made the imperishable halo that lingers around his head. [Applause.] Without these he might have achieved greatness, might have become President, might have freed the slaves as a political necessity, might even have brought the war to a successful close, and have fallen a victim to an assassin's bullet, and yet we should not to-day be speaking of him as we do. It is this one supreme trait of human sympathy that carries his name out of the realm of intellect into that of emotion. [Applause.]

It was this same deep human sympathy that caused Lincoln to hate slavery and to throw all of the power of his logic and eloquence against it. It was this, too, that enabled him to hold that marvelous balance of judgment which could put the Union above all else and could hold back emancipation until the right time. He could put himself in the place of the citizen of the border States and feel that any radical move would imperil the cause of freedom itself. This note of human sympathy sounded forth in his first inaugural; it ran throughout his relations with the soldiers during the great war, and animated his last acts as it had his first. The soldiers fighting on the field and dying in the hospital thought of him, and they said to each other: "He cares! He makes us fight, but he cares"; and they fought on as they never would have fought without that warmth of feeling for the head of the Nation.

Looking at the matter from any aspect and at any period of Lincoln's life, the prime cause of his greatness and of our present reverence for him is the fact that he was human in the best and truest sense of that fine word, and this is reason enough why the Nation loves the name of Abraham Lincoln. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the fast-falling shadows of the past leave few names of men not enshrouded by their gloom. Many of the heroes of to-day will be lost to sight in the dimness of the approaching twilight. To-morrow's sun will lighten up new shrines surrounded by tireless hosts of hero worshipers. As we look toward the past, earth's greatest heroes seem in strangest company—Christ and the condemned men, the missionary and the cannibal, Lincoln and the despised black man—there they stand together in the crowd, on Calvary, surrounded by jeering multitudes; but to-day they are together among the immortals. [Applause.] These saviors of the race will never be forgotten. Lincoln's heart solved more problems than his brain. His very gentleness made him the great emancipator, reconciler, the composite character of the American people. Hope, which is the prophet in every heart, was king and priest besides in his. It ruled his life and consecrated his deeds. Other men turned their backs in despair on the Republic's future; he, through densest darkness, saw with prescient light and gaze the glory of the coming dawn. [Applause.]

In the city of Springfield, in beautiful Oak Ridge Cemetery, he sleeps the sleep of eternity. Many are the times that I have stood with bowed head beside that sacred tomb and thought of the great soul that once inhabited the tenement of clay now moldering into the dust from whence it came. And standing there in the presence of the mighty dead, my faith in humanity has been strengthened and my confidence in the perpetuity of the Republic and its glorious destiny has been made secure. [Applause.]

History tells us that when Robert Bruce, King of Scotland, was dying he asked that his heart be removed from his body and borne by knightly hands to the sacred sepulcher of the Savior. Upon his death the Earl of Douglas, his trusted friend and companion, removed the heart from the body, placed it in a beautiful golden casket, and, surrounding himself with a number of brave young Scotch warriors, they set out on their holy mission. On the way they were attacked by a large body of Moors, who almost overcame them by force of superior numbers. When defeat seemed almost certain, Douglas took in his hand the sacred casket and hurled it far out into the midst of the enemy, shouting:

Lead on, heart of Bruce,
We follow thee!

And the knights of Scotland, never having been defeated when following the leadership of Bruce, took new courage. They rushed upon the enemy with the fury of the whirlwind and gained the day. [Applause.]

To-day when those who, unmindful of the spirit that animated the founders of this Republic, would fan the flames of racial fury and kindle into life the dying embers of bigotry and intolerance; when those who, for base and ignoble purposes of self-exploitation, would place the brand of treason upon the brows of men whose loyalty and devotion in the darkest days of the Nation's life were never questioned—to-day, when the enemies of that broader and better fraternalism, which lies at the very foundation of national peace and national unity, are advancing upon us, the true and loyal citizens of this Republic, of whatever creed or ancestry, catching the inspiration that breathes upon them from the glorious memories of the past, with true American patriotism will take in their hand the great heart of Abraham Lincoln, incase it in their love, and hurl it far out into the midst of the enemy, shouting:

Lead on, heart of Lincoln,
We follow thee;
We follow thee!

[Prolonged applause.]

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the eloquent eulogies given by the gentlemen from Illinois I was stirred and impelled to ask the privilege to contribute my mite to the memory of the greatest American, whom—

Nature of stuff untainted shaped a hero new,
Strong, steadfast in the faith of God, and true.

Upon the anniversary of his birth we, for a moment, turn our grateful thoughts back and renew, through his character, our devotion to a noble land. [Applause.] On April 14, 1865, fell by an assassin's bullet the ideal of American patriotism; the man who for four long years stood between the Nation and her foes; he who knew not whether the morrow's sun would rise on a Union of free men or on the shattered fragments of a once glorious Union; he who drove rebellion from the land and gave the Nation under God a new birth. At a time when men were blinded by passion and prejudice; when brother was pitted against brother and father against son; when ties of friendship, home, and family were broken as a thread; when all was confused, discordant, and unnatural, he was—

Constant as the northern star,
Of whose true-fixed and resting quality
There is no fellow in the firmament.

[Applause.]

The skies are covered by innumerable stars, and each doth glow, but there is but one that holds his place.

He was offered up, a sacrifice to freedom, and by his death the Nation was bound again in union—the boys of the blue, who fought his battles, and the boys of the gray, who respected their conquerer. The fame which gilds the name of Washington is no more enduring than that which loving hearts yield him who, at the cost of his own life, became the savior of his country. [Applause.]

Years have passed. Generations have come and gone, and still the name of Lincoln is a household word. "Age can not wither it, nor custom stale its infinite variety," its human interest. Upon youth will fall the snows of life's coming winters. Furrows will cross their brows, and hearts beat slow near the verge of the grave, but the inspiration of that devoted life will stand a beacon light to those who come, as it did to those who lived and fought with him the battles of the Union. [Applause.]

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. MOON, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill, H. R. 10484, with Mr. RAINEY in the chair.

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield 35 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRITT], a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for 35 minutes.

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Chairman, I shall occupy a few minutes of the time of the committee in submitting some observations on the pending bill, which I intend to support when it comes to a vote in the House. I call attention to page 3 of the Postmaster General's annual report for the fiscal year 1915.

But before making these comments let me say that they are not made for the purpose of indulging in partisan criticism of either the Postmaster General, his subordinates, or the Post Office Department. They are made for the purpose of calling attention to a few facts and conditions in which it seems to me not only this committee but this House and the whole country are interested.

The post-office establishment is the largest single civil governmental agency in the world. It employs more than 300,000 men and women in its administration. It concerns the home life of every man, woman, and child in the United States. It is that special department of government in which all the people are vitally concerned.

As for the present Postmaster General and his assistants, let me say, in order that my words may not be misinterpreted, that I have received from them at all times the most courteous consideration, and therefore my remarks are not biased by any personal pique or resentment.

A great deal has been said about the annual surpluses and deficits in the postal treasury for the past 10 or 15 years. It is a subject in which we are all interested, about which there has been much vain show, and concerning which there have been many unfounded claims.

I think it unwise and highly impolitic for the Post Office Department, whether conducted by Republicans or Democrats, to lay its chief stress upon the red lines of the postal ledgers at the end of the fiscal year, or to boast of a few thousand saved as in favor of one administration against another. I think it is time that everybody should understand that, whatever party controls, the mere fact of a slight balance in favor of the incumbent administration is not the question that most concerns the public. Efficienecy should go far above the mere question of showing a slightly favorable balance.

Of course there should not be a dollar wasted or a penny recklessly spent, and, under wise laws and sound administrations, the postal establishment will usually be self-supporting; but whether the income is a few millions above or below, the expenditure is not the prime question, and the sooner our postal officials get rid of this policy of a surplus at the cost of efficiency the better it will be for the American people. They ought to learn and practice the maxim that the best economy is wise spending.

The average American is intensely interested that his letters shall be received with promptness, carried with dispatch, and delivered with certainty; nor is he primarily concerned as to the political beliefs of the particular public servant who performs the task.

From the report of the Postmaster General it appears that for the fiscal year 1911 there was a surplus of $219,000; for the fiscal year 1912, a deficit of $1,785,000; for the fiscal year 1913, a surplus of $4,510,000; for the fiscal year 1914, a surplus of $4,376,000; but for the fiscal year 1915, a deficit of $11,337,000 is shown. I have omitted the terminal figures that I might not weary you with details.

There has been much unseemly discussion between the present and the last postal administration as to whether the audited balances were, in fact, the real balances. It ought readily to appear that no other balance or deficit can be shown by the exhibit at the end of the fiscal year except that which is shown by the difference between the audited receipts and expenditures of the Post Office Department. There are, and from the very nature of the service must be, a large number of continuing and unclosed accounts which can not be balanced at the end of the year, which can not even be closed within the next quarter, but which must await the expiration of a considerable period of time before any true exhibit can be shown. This part of the department's business can not be properly shown at the end of the fiscal year as either a deficit or a surplus. It is, therefore, true, gentlemen of the committee, that the only balance which can be shown under either a Republican or a Democratic administration at the end of the fiscal year is the audited surplus, or the audited deficit, and the figures must be correct in each case, and it follows that there is no real point to the advantage of either, or any particular credit, in claiming that a system which has been followed from the beginning of the Government does not show relatively the condition of the postal finances, this being all that can be certainly known, no human understanding being able to forecast exactly what a prospective service will cost or what the final balance will be.

It is proper that I should say here that there are other items which should be taken into account, which have not been brought into these balances by any administration at any time. If we are going in for exact fiscal balances in the Post Office Department, we ought to go to the public buildings of the United States which are used in whole or in part by the service and charge to the department that part of the building space, of the lighting, heating, and janitorial service, and every other item of expense incurred for the service. If we desire to show an exact balance, we should put these items in our exhibit of receipts and expenditures.

Not only that, gentlemen, but the immense amount of free mail which is carried and delivered by the service, without any credit whatever, should be taken into account.

I hold in my hand an extract from an address delivered by me at Atlantic City, N. J., on the 5th day of September, 1912, which I will ask leave to print in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, in which I discuss the various aspects of the free-mail privilege, and show by figures, approximately correct, that nearly $20,000,000 annually is lost to the Post Office Department by carrying the various classes of free mail, all of which should be taken into account if it is the purpose of the department to show the exact balance at a given time.

I have mentioned these facts that you may see that there are items which have not been brought into these exhibits by any administration which should be brought in if we intend to show an absolutely correct postal balance. Until that time we are left to the inference, which is a reasonable one, that, whether the figures are made by the one administration or the other, they are correct, and no deduction of bad administration can rightly be made from them without the risk of an injustice to the one or the other or to both.

I insist that we ought to change the method of showing the carriage of our free mail. The service of all the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, as well as the various independent establishments of the Government, should be permitted, as they now are, to conduct their business free of postage charge, but there ought to be, I insist, some system by which an account could be kept of what the income to the Government would be in case all these various establishments were required to place postage stamps on their mail matter, and this ought to be given as a credit to the postal establishment, and made to appear in its annual statement; that is, if we are going to undertake to show exactly what the true balance is. The issuance for that purpose of free postage stamps, or of envelopes with stamps impressed, to be accounted for by the public official using them, would be a simple solution of the problem.

A good deal has been said, and probably much more will be said, upon the floor of this House as to the provision of the pending bill, which changes the basis of pay of the railway companies carrying the United States mail. Unlike my distinguished friend from Tennessee Mr. MOON, I have seen no powerful railroad lobby. So far as I know, the railroads have done nothing but honestly and earnestly presented their case. I know this to be an important question. We who are members of the Postal Committee know with what intense interest, with what high intelligence, and with what honest purpose it was discussed before the committee; how deeply it has concerned both the Post Office Department and the railroad companies, each represented by persons of very high intelligence, and, I am sure, inspired by rightful purposes.

The question which concerns me at this moment, and which I am sure concerns every Member of this House, is that we shall do exact justice to the people at large, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, to that portion of the people comprised in these corporate bodies—the railroads of the United States. So far as I know, so far as I have heard, and so far as I believe, there is no member of the Postal Committee, no Member of this House, who would knowingly do the slightest injury to the railway transportation companies of the country, to whom we must, by custom and of necessity, commit the carriage of the mails of the United States. Let me add a word to what my distinguished friend from Illinois Mr. MADDEN said yesterday. It is a question with which everyone should deal in the utmost frankness, with the most open candor. The railroads should be dealt with just as any other citizen of the United States, whether individual or corporate, is dealt with. They are entitled to that, and they are entitled to no more. They should ask for no more, and no less should be given them. I have no more respect for the man who wants to injure the railroads because they chance to be, in some instances, large aggregations of capital than I have for the representative of the railroads who, because of their great strength and importance, seeks for them an advantage over the plain, every-day citizen of the country. This Congress is big enough to do them justice; they are big enough to be content with justice. We owe them, gentlemen of the committee, just what we owe everybody, to deal with them openly, candidly, and honestly.

It was asked yesterday by the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] whether this bill provided for ample protection for the railroads in the matter of review of rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I call the attention of the committee to line 2, page 49, of the bill, where the following language occurs:

For the purpose of such investigations the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have all powers which it is now authorized to exercise in the investigation of the reasonableness of rates, and the Postmaster General shall supply such information regarding the mail service as may be requested by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

It seems to me that the language could not be more explicit, that the power could not be more plenary. It gives every right of inquiry; it gives every power of review; it leaves nothing which this great commission, a commission clothed with legislative, executive, and judicial powers, would need in order to do justice both to the people and to the railroads. And if we have fixed an honest rate, and we believe we have, then we have done justice to the railroads, but if we have made a mistake we have provided that the commission may review our rates, and, upon proper facts, shall pay to the railroads at any future time the pay to which they are entitled. If I could be brought to believe that this bill would not do that I should not vote for it. We were told that this review was what was desired, but we were also told that Congress should yield all power to the Interstate Commerce Commission, but as representatives of the people we did not feel that all power should be yielded, but that provision should be made for the correction of any possible mistake that we might make.

I do not think a wiser provision could have been made in the bill for the protection of the rights of all the parties in interest. Every fact was weighed with the utmost care, weighed without prejudice toward any, and if it is found that the committee has erred against the railroads, I, for one, will be willing to hasten to correct the mistake.

There is one other part of the bill to which I desire to direct attention, and that is the provision for the payment of the star and rural route service of the country. All the people are vitally interested in this part of the bill. I want to say here that the people of the rural sections, those who are served by the star routes and the rural routes, are not receiving their proportionate part of the benefits of the Postal Service relatively to what is done for the people of the cities and towns. I have no complaint to make of the fact that in the city of New York the people's mail is delivered at their doors nine times a day. I am proud that in my own city of Ashville it is delivered two or three times a day, but I am not satisfied that so many portions of the country are still without delivery more than once a week, and in many instances not even that often. What I ask is not so much a change of the law, but a change of the rule of construction, the law of interpretation. Let me illustrate. Some years ago, under the last administration, it was my duty as an Assistant Postmaster General to construe the law awarding the second-class mail privilege to newspapers and magazines. I found upon my induction into office a hard-and-fast rule which had been in existence for many years, mainly under the administration of my own party, by which whenever an application was made for the second-class mail privilege by a newspaper or a magazine, or a request was made to continue it, the rule of construction was to see if the bureau could not so construe and interpret the law as to deny the privilege.

I proceeded to reverse the rule of construction, and immediately turned it about, and gave direction that, since the Congress had made this law, had given this privilege to the newspapers and magazines, some 30,000 in number, it evidently intended them to have it. Therefore there was an order of instruction issued that if they could, under the terms of the statute, accord the privilege, always to give it and never to withhold it. The result was that the docket was cleared of hundreds of cases almost summarily, because they were not generally founded upon merit. Peace was brought about between the Post Office Department and the newspapers and periodicals of the country, and justice was done to the small ones as well as the large ones in so far as related to the classification of their mail matter. I ask to-day, and I say it with perfect respect to every postal official—as I believe them to be high-minded men, not intending to deny anyone his rights under the law—that I want them to change the rule of interpretation, and when the people of a community ask for a rural route or a star route not to resolve the facts against their petition, but to give them a liberal rule of construction, and resolve the facts, if possible, in favor of their petition. They are entitled to it. [Applause.] But, gentlemen, I go further; not only ought they to resolve the rule in favor of the petitioner and give him his mail, if reasonably possible, but they ought affirmatively, on their own motion, to go and survey the route and give it to the people, because this Congress, in voting these great appropriations for that purpose, intended that the people shall have the benefit of the mail in the rural and star route sections of the country. Let us see if that is what we now mean. Let us inquire whether it is any less than what we mean.

Gentlemen, if a complaint comes here from one of our cities we are sensitively responsive to that complaint. It comes from the center of intelligence and wealth, from the midst of the newspapers, and we respond quickly to the demand; and I ask that we shall go out into the rural sections, among the timid masses, yet a most respectable and deserving class, and affirmatively, on our own motion, have the agents of the Government, through the Post Office Department, inquire whether this community is not, under the law, entitled to a star route or a rural route, and that every representation of the petition and investigation should be taken into account, not for the purpose of keeping the star route or the rural route from being allowed, but with the determined purpose, if possible, of giving it to the people of the country.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITT. I shall be delighted.

Mr. BLACK. Is it not true that the policy of the Postmaster General has recently been changed in reference to rural routes, and that he does not now require a petition to be filed with his department?

Mr. BRITT. As to the petition, that is true. One more word on that line, gentlemen. As was disclosed by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], long distances and a sparcely settled country ask for a star route. It is not a paying proposition. It can not pay; we know that, and therefore it is easy to make the bond too big. There is no difficulty in ruling against the proposition, but I trust I shall not be misunderstood. I do not mean to say that this was done with partiality. That is not my purpose, but I am addressing myself to the rule, and I believe the rule is administered honestly, and that Mr. MONDELL or myself would get as much as you gentlemen of the majority would get, and I do not wish it to be understood that I am making a partisan criticism in order to get to strike the Post Office Department. Far from it.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Is it not a fact under this administration that many star routes have been abandoned because of the expense of carrying the mail, some of which had been in existence for 30 years? These people are certainly entitled to mail facilities. They are aiding in settling up the country.

Mr. BRITT. It is a fact that quite a number have been abandoned. A word more on that line and I am through. We ought to bring into this House a bill to relieve this situation.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption at that point?

Mr. BRITT. Certainly.

Mr. MOON. I understood the gentleman to say in reply to the gentleman from Idaho that a great number of star routes had been abandoned.

Mr. BRITT. Not a great number, but a number.

Mr. MOON. Was that for the purpose of increasing the rural routes in order to take the place of them?

Mr. BRITT. In some instances; yes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. If the gentleman will permit, there are many routes in the intermountain States which have been abandoned because of the expense of carrying the mail, which routes had been in existence for 25 and 30 years, and the people have not had their mail brought to them; on the contrary, some of them have to go 30 miles to a post office.

Mr. BRITT. And often with no mail service at all.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No mail service at all in many instances, except as stated.

Mr. MOON. I do not know personally about this, but I think the department differs with the gentleman about that.

Mr. BRITT. I only mention the case of Mr. MONDELL's district because I chance to have heard the facts in that particular instance. I have no doubt there are similar conditions elsewhere, as I know there are in my district, while in the cities, if I may call the beautiful towns in my district such, the service is all they are entitled to, and we there have no ground of complaint, and we do not make any, but when men make a day's journey to me, a long day's trip, through the mud to intercede with me to try to make provision if I can, either by law or through the department, for the mail to go to them at least once a week, in a splendid farming section of the country, among people that I know to be as patriotic as any in this country, my interests are enlisted and I should not be worthy to represent them if I did not feel interested.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. BRITT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Does not the gentleman think the Government would save a great deal of money in contracting for star-route service if it adhered to the contract, especially in regard to the length of time? Is it not a fact that the Government contracts with carriers for a four-year term, and very frequently arbitrarily disregards the terms of the contract and asks a readvertisement, and especially in the event they have made some mistake in classification of the mail on star routes, or in the event they want to change the route? In some instances the contract is abrogated after a few months and the service readvertized regardless of the fact that the contractor has gone to the expense of equipping himself with wagons, horses, and so forth, to perform the service by reason of which he stands to lose several thousand dollars.

Mr. BRITT. I understand that to be the case in some instances.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. One reason why these contractors bid so high is because of the fact that there is a provision in the contract that the contract can be severed by the Government on 30 days' notice, and they have to anticipate the possible severance of the contract in making their bid.

Mr. MOON. You speak of that condition in Idaho?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. And possibly elsewhere; but I know of three cases in Idaho, one where they arbitrarily changed the route, and another where they made a change in the classification of the mail and made an advertisement, and a new bidder came and bid a few dollars less and got the contract, and the new contractor, who had only carried the mail for six months, lost $3,000 in equipment.

Mr. MOON. But you still have the mail service?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes; but the new contractor is now trying to throw it up.

Mr. MOON. Do you recollect how many rural routes have been added in the 12 months. I am asking that question of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRITT].

Mr. BRITT. I do not have the exact figures, but I know that a number have been added. The number is stated in the Postmaster General's report.

Mr. MOON. There are several thousand more than we have had before.

Mr. BRITT. I want to say in regard to the pending bill that I think it is upon the whole a very good bill. I shall support it, but I think we should bring into this House a measure which will provide that the rule of construction which I have described shall be changed, so that all the facts and circumstances shall be resolved in favor of the application and not against it, except where they are very strong, so that the people of the country shall have the full benefits of the mail. Their well-being, gentlemen, depends upon it. The education and training of their children is involved in it. Much of their happiness depends upon it. It is a matter of great concern to them. I yield to no man in this House or upon this committee in his willingness to cooperate with the Post Office Department. I refuse to criticize it in any unjust or improper way. It is my duty to aid it, and I am willing to do so. I think the Postmaster General and his assistants and this committee should cooperatively and sympathetically work together. This great establishment is too large for any one person to know all the facts and circumstances concerning it, and the committee and the department and this House ought to sympathetically and without partisan purpose look into every important condition in relation to the service and see wherein we can improve it and in how many more places we can carry the mail to the door of the plain man of the country who does not to-day receive it.

I am not saying that the service in this particular is worse than it has been under former administrations. I am not presenting these facts and urging these propositions in order to compare one administration with another unfavorably. I am urging it as an actual necessity, from personal knowledge, and I believe that the great interest the Postal Committee feels in the subject and this House feels in it will result, through the cooperation of the Post Office Department, in such a fair and equitable distribution of the mail facilities as will leave no man with a well-founded ground of complaint that he is not receiving the equal benefits of the service at all times. [Applause.]

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman believe the Government's plan of advertising for carriers over the star routes the proper method?

Mr. BRITT. No; I do not.

Mr. KEARNS. Do you believe that it is beneficial to the system at all that often the bidders will lower their bids in order to get the contract, and in that way fail to maintain the proper equipment for carrying the mail?

Mr. BRITT. No. The final letting of the contract and the establishment of the service ought not to be determined on the question of a few dollars' difference between the bid and the proposed award, but the department ought to inquire into it and see if it is not possible to give that community a reasonable service.

Mr. KEARNS. May I ask the gentleman a further question, please?

Mr. BRITT. Certainly.

Mr. KEARNS. Do you not believe that the rural patrons of our mails are entitled to the same service that the city is?

Mr. BRITT. The same service relatively to their peculiar situation? I certainly do.

Mr. KEARNS. Is there any more reason for advertising for a rural star-route carrier than there is for advertising for a city carrier?

Mr. BRITT. Well, the conditions are not exactly the same. The Post Office Department ought to exercise the right to get the best service it can get, and it ought not to be too narrowly circumscribed by law as to the exercise of its discretion in getting it. But in the end the question is whether that judgment is so exercised as to give the service to which the people are entitled under the law.

Mr. KEARNS. In advertising under the bid system, do you not believe that the bids are often so low that the service suffers?

Mr. BRITT. That is oftentimes true, to my knowledge.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Is it not true also that the lowest bidder must be given the contract under the law?

Mr. BRITT. That is the rule, but the Postmaster General has the right to reject all bids.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Chairman, I submit herewith a part of an address delivered by me before the Fifteenth Annual Convention of the National Association of Postmasters of the First Class at Atlantic City, N. J., September 5, 1912:

THE FREE-MAIL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. President, in treating a public question, particularly in an expository or critical way, it is necessary to understand clearly not only the subject matter but also the particular terminology, the source of responsible authority, and the scope of practical application.

By "free mail" is meant matter received, transported, and delivered by the Postal Establishment free of charge to the sender.

It may be appropriately divided into three classes—namely, congressional frank mail, official penalty mail, and personal free mail.

By congressional frank mail is meant all letters, speeches, public documents, and other matter which may be lawfully mailed free of postage by the Vice President, Senators, Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Philippine Commissioners, and public documents mailed without postage by the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Official penalty mail embraces matter mailed postage free by the officers of the executive, judicial, and independent establishments of the Government.

Personal free mail is matter which Congress has authorized private persons, either in consideration of valuable public service or in pursuance of an established public policy, to send through the mails free of postage.

While the terms "frank mail" and "free mail" are, in a general sense, synonymous, nevertheless the former is by usage specially applied to legislative free mail because of the requirement that the Senator or Representative shall write his name, or "frank," on the envelope, while official free mail is called "penalty mail" for the reason that there is entered on the envelope the penalty prescribed by law for its improper use.

CONGRESSIONAL FRANK MAIL.

Matter which may be mailed under the congressional frank is as follows:

1. Mail to any Government official, or to any person, including correspondence not exceeding 4 ounces in weight, on official or departmental business, sent by the Vice President of the United States, Senators, Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Philippine Commissioners. The free-correspondence privilege commences with the date of election of Senators, Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Philippine Commissioners, and extends, with the free document and other privileges, to the 1st day of December following the expiration of their terms, while the free-mailing privilege for seeds continues for a period of nine months from the expiration of their terms. (Act of Apr. 28, 1904, 33 Stat. L., p. 441; P. L. and R., sec. 509.)

12. Mail sent under the written autograph signature of Mrs. Frances Folsom Cleveland, widow of the late President Grover Cleveland. (Act of Feb. 1, 1909, 35 Stat L., p. 591.)

Having now pointed out the several classes of free mail matter, and the laws authorizing them, together with their various scopes and limitations, I shall next proceed to ascertain the extent to which they are used by those entitled to their benefits.

There is no provision for recording the number of pieces of either free or paid mail matter carried and delivered daily by the Post Office Establishment, but a fair estimate may be made by extending the results of the official weighing and counting of the year 1907. While free mail is not all first-class matter, nevertheless it is closed to inspection and is given extraordinary treatment in handling and delivery and may be regarded as first-class matter in reckoning the postage properly chargeable, and I shall accordingly so treat it.

It is estimated that during the fiscal year 1912 the postal establishment received, transported, and delivered 310,437,878 pieces of legislative and official free mail, but there is no data for estimating the number of pieces of personal free mail.

Its aggregate weight was 61,415,335 pounds.

It comprised 3.8 per cent of the total domestic mail of the United States.

The cost per pound for handling, transportation, and delivery was 10.12 cents.

The aggregate cost to the service was $6,214,239.55.

The cost per capita to every man, woman, and child was 6 cents.

The postage chargeable at the first-class rate was $19,649,630.04, an average amount per capita of 20.4 cents.

There were 4,321,266 free official registrations, on which the regular fee is 10 cents, amounting to $432,126.60.

There were transported and delivered 373,633,544 pieces of free-in-county newspapers and periodicals, aggregating 58,017,631 pounds, on which the postage at 1 cent a pound would be $580,176.31.

The total loss to the postal revenues on free legislative and official mail, free registrations, and free newspapers and periodicals, to say nothing of other personal free mail, was, therefore, estimated at $20,661,932.95, or, in round numbers, $20,500,000, for which the Post Office Department received no credit whatever.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LAFEAN].

Mr. LAFEAN. Mr. Chairman, on January 19, 1916, I introduced a bill, H. R. 9414, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9414) to grant certain holidays to postal employees.

Be it enacted, etc., That letter carriers employed in the Rural Delivery Service and letter carriers employed in the City Delivery Service and clerks in first and second class post offices and Railway Mail Service shall be granted the benefit of the following holidays: New Year's Day (Jan. 1), Washington's Birthday (Feb. 22), Decoration Day (May 30), Independence Day (July 4), the first Monday in September, known as Labor Day, and such other days as the President of the United States or the governors of their respective States may set apart as fast or thanksgiving days, or that may be specially designated as holidays by proclamation of the governors or by the statutes of the States in which their offices are located.

SEC. 2. That should the needs of the service require the employment on holidays of letter carriers employed in the Rural Delivery Service or letter carriers employed in the City Delivery Service or clerks in first and second class post offices, such employees shall be allowed a full day as compensatory time on one of the six week days following the holiday upon which such service is performed.

Mr. Chairman, this bill, as will be observed, grants benefit for services rendered on the following holidays: New Year's Day, January 1; Washington's Birthday, February 22; Decoration Day, May 30; Independence Day, July 4; Labor Day, the first Monday in September.

It also provides for such other days as the President of the United States or the governors of their respective States may set apart as those given days, and to provide compensatory time on one of six week days following the holidays on which such service was performed.

The committee in its wisdom changed the compensatory time as one day of the 30 days following such holidays.

In glancing through the Postal Laws and Regulations I find that on the question of opening of post offices on holidays that section 284 reads as follows:

Postmasters may observe as holidays: New Year's Day (Jan. 1); Washington's Birthday (Feb. 22); Decoration Day (May 30); Independence Day (July 4); the first Monday in September, known as Labor Day; Christmas (Dec. 25); and such other days as the President of the United States or the governors of their respective States may set apart as fast or thanksgiving days or that may be specially designated as holidays by proclamation of the governors or by the statutes of the States in which their offices are located.

2. When a legal holiday falls on Sunday the following Monday may be observed, unless otherwise specially provided by proper authority.

3. Post offices shall be kept open on holidays a sufficient length of time to meet the public convenience. Mails shall be made up and dispatched as on other days.

Further on I note that section 735, on the same subject of holidays, contains the following provision:

Service shall not be required on rural delivery routes on New Year's Day, Washington's Birthday, Memorial or Decoration Day (May 30), Fourth of July, Labor Day (the first Monday in September), or on such day as the President may set apart as Thanksgiving Day. Service is required on Christmas Day.

2. When a holiday on which service is not required falls on Sunday the following Monday shall be observed, unless otherwise specially provided.

According to custom in different communities, the question of opening post offices on holidays has been guided largely by public opinion. If the desire of the public was for a general observance of certain holidays and all business was suspended on these days, and there was no demand for postal facilities on those days, the postmasters observed section 284 of the Postal Laws and Regulations and closed their offices and gave the employees the benefit of the holiday. If the postmaster in any city knew there was a demand for the delivery of mail on holidays, he took advantage of the discretion contained in section 284 and gave the public such facilties as in his judgment the occasion required. The section above referred to is a sensible one, as Post Office Department officials are not expected to know the customs of the people in different localities and they depend entirely on the judgment of postmasters in giving a satisfactory service to the public in the offices over which they preside.

In many large post offices throughout the country such holidays as Washington's Birthday, Memorial Day, Independence Day, Labor Day, and Thanksgiving Day have been observed by the closing of post offices and the suspension of deliveries of mail on those days. No complaint had been made by the public, and postmasters felt that they were justified in giving the benefit of the holidays to the employees to be observed by them with the same freedom as other citizens in these communities. The observance of holidays by the public is becoming more general, and our business houses and factories and mills and industrial plants where large numbers of men and women are employed are beginning, during the summer months, to close down business on Saturday afternoons in order to give the employees the benefit of an extra half day for rest each week.

President Wilson issued the usual proclamation setting aside Thursday, November 25, 1915, as a day of thanksgiving and prayer, and calling for a suspension of business in all departments of the Government and also for a general observance of the day by all citizens in the country. Many postmasters had consulted with the business people through the local boards of trade and chambers of commerce and other business men's associations and had also tested public sentiment by announcing in the press that their offices would be closed on Thanksgiving Day if there was no protest from the public or demand for a delivery of mail on that day. In cities where these announcements were made they seemed to meet with general approval, and postmasters had printed signs placed in conspicuous parts of the post offices and also made announcement in the press that Thanksgiving Day would be observed and postal facilities suspended. Announcements were also made to the employees in order that they might make such preparations as they deemed best to enjoy the holiday with their families. In large post offices, where bulletins of postal information are published, these announcements were printed for the information of the employees and they were looking forward to the benefit of the holiday.

On Saturday, November 20, 1915, an order was printed in the Daily Bulletin of Orders Affecting the Postal Service, of which the following is a copy:

HOLIDAY SERVICE BY LETTER CARRIERS.

OFFICE OF FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, November 19, 1915.

As the primary function of the Postal Establishment is service to the public, it is believed that even though the suspension of delivery service on the holidays enumerated in section 284 of the Postal Laws and Regulations might be justified by the sentiment of a majority of the business patrons, service should not be entirely suspended, as other patrons are entitled to equal consideration in the delivery of mail. The numerous complaints received by the department from patrons on account of the complete suspension of mail delivery and collection on such holidays prompted the department to invite the opinions of a number of representative postmasters, and their reports show clearly that at least one delivery over the entire territory should be made in addition to the prompt handling of special delivery matter and perishable parcels. Collection service necessary to avoid complaint on account of delays in dispatch should also be given.

Postmasters will therefore act accordingly hereafter in the matter of service to be given by letter carriers on holidays.

DANIEL C. ROPER,
First Assistant Postmaster General.

This bulletin was not mailed from the department in Washington until the evening of November 20, 1915, and they did not reach many post offices until a day or two prior to Thanksgiving Day, and postmasters were forced to issue hurried orders canceling their previous announcements and stating that the post offices would be open and delivery of mails made in the regular manner. The order came as a shock to postmasters and employees, as there had been no complaint from the public, and, in fact, when letter carriers were making their rounds on Thanksgiving Day they were asked by the citizens why they were not enjoying the holiday which they had been led to believe the employees were to have the benefit of.

It has been stated that the reasons why this order was issued was the personal pique of a Post Office Department official against a postmaster who had earned the good will of the public and the sympathy and cooperation of the employees, and in order to embarrass the postmaster, who had announced that his office would be closed on Thanksgiving Day, that this official induced the Postmaster General to issue the general order of November 19. If this be true, it is a practical demonstration of the untold harm that can be done by placing extraordinary power in the hands of officials whose acts can be guided more by their personal prejudices and whims than a desire to benefit the public service. This act follows out a policy of the present administrative officers of the Post Office Department in their effort to repeal every law on the statute books of benefit to the employees, and of their further efforts to nullify many of these laws by the issuance of arbitrary orders.

On November 20, 1915, the same date that the order was issued compelling postal employees to work on Thanksgiving Day, the publicity bureau of the Post Office Department sent out a news item to the press containing the statement that the department was "expecting another record-breaking rush of Christmas mail and had issued instructions to postmasters for its quick and effective dispatch and delivery"; that the instructions contained orders to postmasters that "vehicles are to be employed only when the number of heavy and bulky parcels or the area to be covered is such that it is not economical to use a substitute on foot. In some places push carts, bicycles, and motor vehicles with baskets may be used to advantage. When the volume of mail is too great for these means, horse-drawn vehicles driven by the carriers or substitutes should be employed. At the larger city-delivery offices the carrier force and delivery equipment should be specially organized for the effective performance of the task which will be imposed upon the service. This should be done in such a way as to admit of expansion from day to day, as the growing business demands. Last year, through intelligent direction and the enthusiastic cooperation of all connected with the Postal Service, the department successfully handled the largest quantity of holiday mail in its history. This year the volume will greatly exceed anything heretofore known, and it is confidently believed that the same spirit will animate the force and that all mail received will be delivered before the close of Christmas day."

The prophecy of the department, that the mail would be delivered before the close of Christmas day, was fulfilled—if the report emanating from the publicity bureau of the Post Office Department, under date of December 28, 1915, contains correct information to the public.

What reason the department had to expect that the rank and file of the employees would be animated by a desire to enthusiastically cooperate with them in this extraordinary emergency is hard for any intelligent mind to conceive. The department officials have ruthlessly dismissed from the service and forced the resignations of a large number of employees whose sole offense was that they had become superannuated on account of age and its infirmities. Hundreds of other employees had their salaries reduced through a so-called readjustment and standardization of the service, and the Postmaster General had recommended to Congress a repeal of the eight-hour law, a repeal of the law that grants a day of rest each week to the employees, and recommended a reduction in the hourly pay of the substitute employees, who do not make sufficient wage to meet their living expenses. If such recommendations could inspire confidence in any class of workingmen, then human nature must have undergone a wonderful change under the present administration of the Post Office Department.

While I am on this subject of the order which deprived postal employees from the benefit of holidays, I might state that this order will effectively deprive the post-office clerks and letter carriers from holding their annual State conventions which have been held on holidays and were attended by the employees in post offices throughout the States. At these gatherings the employees were addressed by postmasters and the subjects discussed were problems affecting the Postal Service. In the smaller post offices throughout the country and in the outlying districts of the larger offices letter carriers will be required to work a full eight hours on holidays, as in the great majority of instances the districts are so arranged that but one delivery of mail can be made within eight hours.

It might also be well to draw attention to the fact that an Executive order is issued each year that grants a half holiday on Saturdays to Government employees. The first of these orders which was issued by President Roosevelt restricted the Saturday half holidays to certain specified employees. Under date of June 8, 1909, President Taft issued a more general order, a copy of which reads as follows:

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

It is hereby ordered that on Saturdays during July, August, and September, until further notice, four hours, exclusive of time for luncheon, shall constitute a day's work for all employees in the Federal public service, wherever employed; and all departmental or other orders in conflict with this order are hereby revoked, except as to the naval stations named in the Executive order of April 4, 1908.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 8, 1909.

It was found that under this order postal employees would be benefited thereby, and under date of June 25, 1909, President Taft issued a second order, which reads as follows:

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

The following order will supersede that of June 8, 1909, as to hours of labor on Saturday during the months mentioned.

It is hereby ordered that during the months of July, August, and September of each year, until further notice, four hours, exclusive of time for luncheon, shall constitute a day's work on Saturdays for all clerks and other employees of the Federal Government, wherever employed; and all Executive or other orders in conflict herewith, except the Executive order of April 4, 1909, relating to certain naval stations, are hereby revoked.

Provided, however, That this order shall not apply to any bureau or office of the Government, or to any of the clerks or other employees thereof, that may for special public reasons be excepted therefrom by the head of the department having supervision or control of such bureau or office, or where the same would be inconsistent with the provisions of existing law.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 25, 1909. (No. 1096.)

You will note the provision which is added to this second order and which was inserted in order to keep postal employees working on Saturday afternoons during the summer months when all Government employees were enjoying a half holiday.

I might also draw attention to the fact that the Government departments in Washington were not only closed on Christmas and New Year's Days, but the employees were granted an extra half holiday on the days preceding Christmas and New Year's in order that they might enjoy the advantages of the true holiday spirit. No complaint whatever is made for this small privilege which has been granted to the employees, but it does not seem fair that "extra" special privileges should be enjoyed by high-salaried officials of the Post Office Department, whose duties are not overexacting and who seem to devote considerable of their time in formulating rules and regulations that will tax every ounce of energy and exact a maximum speed for every minute of every hour from the hardest-worked and poorest-paid employees in the service whom they, unfortunately, are in temporary control of.

I trust that the Congress will take notice of what I consider is a grave injustice that has been done the rank and file of the postal employees of this country and that the provision inserted in the Post Office appropriation bill naming the holidays that are observed as such and giving the benefit of these days to the employees, and in the event of an employee being required to work on a holiday to grant him compensatory time in the way of a full day during the 30 days following the holiday upon which service is required. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAKES]. [Applause.]

Mr. BEAKES. Mr. Chairman, the Post Office appropriation bill, which is presented to you by a unanimous committee, after much deliberation and after more extended hearings than has been usual with the committee in the past few years, contains considerable legislation which is greatly needed for the betterment of the Postal Service. It does not contain all the legislation that is needed, but it contains all that the committee could agree upon, and there will be other legislation undoubtedly presented to you by the committee in separate bills. There is need of more postal legislation this year than usual, because of the failure of the appropriation bill to pass last year, owing to the shortness of the session and the fact that the Senate did not take up the bill until near the closing hours of the session. Considerable of the legislation found in the appropriation bill this year was passed by the House last year and also met with the approval of the Senate. The Post Office Department is the biggest business in which the Government engages. It comes nearest to the people. It is an expanding business, and the postal receipts for the coming year promise to be far the largest in the history of the country. If we would not hamper it, if we would encourage this expansion, if we would improve the service, we must alter some of the legislation which hampers its development. It can not find its fullest development unless the laws which govern it keep pace with its growth and are from time to time improved. As I said, we had no legislation last year, so that at this time we must put into the bill at least two years of legislation, and even then I do not believe that we will have done all that we ought to have done for the good of the Post Office Department.

Much of the legislation in this bill is important, but none is more important than the sections relating to paying the railroads for the transportation of the mail. The railroads have had for several years a committee on railway mail pay, and this committee has been conducting a vigorous campaign against any legislation which would alter the cumbersome, unscientific, and unsatisfactory method of payment in vogue since 1873, except such alterations which while not changing the system would give the railroads more money and relieve them of part of the service now rendered. Every argument of the best brains the railroads could command has been made on their side of the case, and they have never succeeded in convincing any commission or any committee of Congress that they were right in their contentions. The surprising thing to me is that they should have been able to keep the railroads a unit against this legislation, which I believe will make a much fairer division among the roads of the money paid for mail transportation, and which will prove beneficial to those roads which have been underpaid for carrying the mails. The only explanation of this that occurs to me is that the individual railroads have not made a study of this matter for themselves and have taken the word of their committee, and that the only literature on the subject which the most of them have studied is the voluminous and catchy literature which their committee on railway mail pay has furnished them. Finding their own effort unsuccessful, they have induced a few chambers of commerce, which have made no study of the subject, to write the Members of this House protesting against this legislation. Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that this is not hastily considered legislation. The subject has been studied by four commissions of Congress and $145,719.74 has been spent by the Government in investigating it. I submit that no chamber of commerce, without a scintilla of the evidence thus adduced or even a knowledge that the subject has been thus investigated, is competent to express an opinion upon it. Besides the voluminous hearings before these commissions, the committees of this House have had hearings on the subject, and it is a singular thing that practically all of the men whose official duty it has been to investigate the subject have arrived at the conclusion that the system for which the railroads stand is neither fair to the Government nor to the individual railroads.

The Hubbard Commission appointed by President Grant in 1876, after a two years' investigation reached the conclusion that the railroads should be paid for space and that upon this basis they should be paid the cost and a fair profit thereon. In 1883, pursuant to an act of Congress, Postmaster General Gresham appointed a commission, which, after a six months' investigation, recommended a system based on space, weight, and speed, the weight being used simply as a factor to determine the amount of space to be used. In 1898 a congressional commission, known as the Wolcott-Loud Commission, was appointed, which reported that, in their opinion, the amount paid the railroads was not excessive. Mr. Loud, of this commission, said:

> Space, in my opinion, should be the basis of pay, and I reach this conclusion from the fact, which must be apparent to everyone who has made a careful study of the question, that space is the principal and therefore should be the controlling factor.

But this commission did not recommend space because, as they said, of "the impossibility with the evidence before the commission of applying the space basis of payment." And Mr. Loud, in his opinion, said that "a proper investigation in this direction was not pursued." In 1907 Postmaster General Cortelyou began an investigation, which was not finished until in 1911, under Postmaster General Hitchcock, and which resulted in a recommendation by the Post Office Department of the space basis by Postmaster General Hitchcock. Gen. Burleson has since strongly recommended the space basis.

In 1912 a joint commission of the Senate and House was appointed, known since as the Bourne Commission, and after two years of investigation, and 12 volumes of hearings, they unanimously reported in favor of the space basis. The Post Office Committee of the Sixty-third Congress recommended the space basis, and this House by a nearly unanimous vote approved that basis. Your committee in this Congress, after again hearing the railroads, have again reported for the space basis.

In the last Congress I made a speech designed to show from the testimony before the Bourne Commission that the railroads had no system of cost accounting by which they could tell whether there was a profit or loss to them in carrying the mails. In their hearings before the committee this year they acknowledged this to be so. The difficulty is that there is no agreement among the roads as to how much of the fixed charges, the overhead expenses, shall be borne by the freight or passenger service, and how the passenger-service expenses shall be divided between passengers, express, and mail. I illustrated this in my speech of two years ago with the example of one road which had a mail contract yielding them $467,522.26 in 1912, on which, by using eight different methods of figuring used by the roads, the results varied from a profit of $48,117.78 to a loss of $289,147.84, the figuring being done by the railroad. It is entirely a question as to what proportion of the overhead expenses the mails should bear. There is no question that the roads are not out of pocket by carrying the mails. That they themselves do not believe that they are is strongly evidenced by the fact that they are all anxious to secure mail contracts, and that, although there is no law at present compelling them to carry the mails, there are none of them declining to contract to carry them. And this is for the reason that the cost of maintaining their tracks, their stations, the interest on their bonds, the salaries of their officers, the pay of their trainmen, would go on just the same if they did not carry an ounce of mail. I am not arguing that the mails should not pay their just share of the overhead expenses, but I am saying that the railroads would lose money if the Government should undertake to transport the mails by automobiles or in some other manner than on the railroads. And I am of the opinion that if Congress enacts the space basis under the provisions in this bill, the railroads will receive much more next year for carrying the mails than they do this year.

What then is the real objection of the railroads to the space basis? It is that the railroads wish to hamper the development and growth of the Parcel Post System. Why do they wish this? The railroads are in partnership with the express companies—as far, at least, as their compensation for carrying express is concerned. Most of the roads divide with the express companies on a fifty-fifty basis. That is, the railroads transport the express for half the gross receipts of the express company. As the gross receipts of the express companies increase, the receipts of the railroads increase. As the express companies are forced to reduce their rates to compete with the parcel post, the revenue of the roads fall off. Now, the present weighing system hampers the development of the parcel post. In many cases the Government has to pay the railroads more than it could get the same service for if it paid the express companies for it, in which case the railroads would only get for the same transportation half what the express companies get. During two months in the year—for the holiday season—the Post Office Department is allowed by law to ship empty mail bags in the mails instead of by freight. During the last holiday season, instead of using the mails, and freight being too slow, some of these bags were shipped by express, at an average saving of 37½ cents per hundred pounds. On shipments from 21 cities the saving was $1,014.19 over what it would have cost to transport the same weight by mail. It must be remembered also that the railroads only got half of what the express companies received. Now, in the cases where the railroads charge the Government more than double the rates received from the express companies, you will see how the Government will lose money on its parcel-post packages.

The railroads maintain that the only proper basis for carrying the mails is weight, and at first blush this appeals to one who has not deeply studied the subject as correct, this being the way in which charges on freight are determined. But the roads are very careful to claim that the compensation for carrying a given weight of mail should be higher than a given weight of freight, because the mail is carried on passenger trains and not on freight trains. But passengers are not carried by weight; the slender little woman has to pay just as much for her ticket as the big fat man who may weigh three times as much. Passenger rates are figured by space, so many passengers in a car. Neither is the rate charged for freight entirely dependent upon weight. A railroad would charge much more for transporting a ton of feathers than they would a ton of iron, for the reason that the feathers take up more space and fewer tons can be loaded in a car. The freight on a buggy knocked down is less than a buggy shipped as set up, because it occupies less space.

As a matter of fact, however disguised, space enters into the making of freight rates by weight. But if the mails are to be carried at freight rates, the amount to be paid the railroads would be very materially reduced. It would not be fair to the railroads to so compensate them for carrying the mails—first, because the mails are moved on faster trains than freight; second, because less tons can be carried in a postal car than in a freight car; and, third, because the postal car in which mail is carried weighs much more than the freight car.

As has been stated, the expenses of carrying passengers, express, and mail are included together by the railroads, and have never been separated by them or by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Neither is there anywhere data which would enable an absolute separation of these expenses to be made. Clearly only space and not weight is considered in the making up of passenger rates, and there is no way of determining the relative cost of passengers and mail in a train carrying both passengers and mail except by a consideration of the space occupied by each. In Pullman coaches space occupied only is considered, and the same charge is made for a berth, whether it is occupied by two persons or by one. It seems by analogy that the carrying of the mails might be figured on space the same as passengers, as both are carried on the same train. The more so as the greater part of a postal car is not taken up by the mail at all, as fully 75 per cent of the car space is taken up with racks and boxes for the distribution of the mail and the necessary space for the railway mail clerks to move around in to distribute the mail.

The present law reduces the amount of compensation by weight as the weight increases. For instance, a road carrying 5,000 pounds of mail per day will receive $171 per annum per mile of road, and a road carrying 10,000 pounds of mail per day will receive $221.75 per annum per mile of road.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. BEAKES. Yes; I would like to have 10 minutes more.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. BEAKES. Now, the average daily mail load of the 60-foot railway postal cars in the United States is about 5,000 pounds. To show the absurdity of the present method of figuring let us take as an example a road running one mail train a day with one postal car. The Bourne Commission's report shows that the 60-foot steel postal car weighs about 50 tons; the railroad testimony shows that they vary in weight from 45 to 58 tons. If the road we take as an example carries the average load of mail in its one postal car—5,000 pounds—it will receive $171 per year per mile, and for this will carry a load consisting of 50 tons of car and 2½ tons of mail, or 52½ tons. If the weight of mail doubles, it will receive $221.75 for carrying 50 tons of car and 5 tons of mail, or 55 tons. In other words, when it draws its heavier load it will receive $4.03 per ton carried, and when it has its lighter load it will receive $3.02 per ton carried. Assume, for example, another road carrying 10 tons of mail a day on four postal cars. For this it would receive $323.25 per mile per annum. If its mail increased to 20 tons, it would get $526.25. In the first case, when hauling 210 tons, it would get $1.54 per ton per mile per annum, but when hauling 220 tons it would get $2.39 per ton per mile per annum. It is hard to explain the present system of paying by weight with a decreasing payment as the weight increases. If you look up the law carefully you will see I am giving you the correct figures, although the amounts vary so largely. Take one more example, a road running two mail trains, two postal cars, and carrying 3 tons of mail a day. They would haul 103 tons a day for $181.15 per mile a year. If the mail increases to 6 tons a day, they would then haul 106 tons for $242.05 a mile a year. When they were hauling 103 tons they would get $1.76 a ton, but when they were hauling 106 tons they would get $2.28 a ton. I have tried hard to imagine a case where under the present law doubling the weight of mail a railroad carries without increasing the number of postal cars used will not result in giving the roads more for each ton they haul. I do not believe such a case exists.

The railroads can not defend a system which increases the price per ton hauled as the weight increases, and they attempt to show that they are underpaid by using the short-line railroads to haul their chestnuts out of the fire. The short-line roads will benefit by the space system. Under the present law railroads get a rental for 60-foot postal cars, but short-line roads, when the mail is light, carry the mail either in 30-foot department cars, for which they get no rental, or in locked pouches. Under this bill these roads will get compensation for the space used in distribution and by the railway mail clerks for which they now receive no compensation. They will also get the same terminal charges as the roads having a longer haul. The great mass of the testimony before this committee, while nominally aimed at the space system, really furnished the strongest argument against the unfairness and injustice done under the present thoroughly unscientific weight system.

The present bill will not cut down the amount paid the railroads unless the Interstate Commerce Commission should decide that the rates in the bill are too high. The bill provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission may raise the rates if they are found to be too low. We want to treat the railroads fairly. They are entitled to not only the cost of carrying the mails, but to a fair profit. We can not determine the cost. The railroads own up to the fact that they can not determine the cost. If an investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission can do so, then the rate can be more fairly determined. As it is, we give them practically what they get from the passenger traffic in proportion to the space used. We pay for all space used. The system automatically takes care of increasing mails. If the Government, after buying the space, can load more economically, it can get the benefit of the more economical loading. There will no longer be three or four thousand different standards of payment and the cost per ton hauled will not be increased as the mails increase, as under the present system.

As to the misuse of the parcel post to avoid higher freight rates, the department now has the power to restrict the number of parcels to the same consignee that they will accept. But the parcel post must be encouraged and built up, its usefulness to the general public increased, and we can not allow the practical partnership existing between the railroads and the express companies to hamper and impede the development of the parcel post. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FOSTER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 9213. An act to authorize the Gary Land Co. to construct a bridge across the Grand Calumet River in the State of Indiana.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3518) granting pensions and increase of pension to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. MCCUMBER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution 16.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations, are authorized to change the text of the paragraph in the bill for payment of judgments in Indian depredation claims so as to correct errors in the certified description of two of the judgments provided for therein.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. JONES and Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Navy Department.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield a minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY] is recognized.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing a speech made by a Union soldier of my district on the life of President Lincoln.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request to extend his remarks in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] ready to go on?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; I am ready to go on.

Mr. MOON. Just a moment, if the gentleman please. I would like to put some matter in the RECORD.

Mr. STEENERSON. Very well.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, it was stated a while ago by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH] that the Government advertised for bids in Idaho and other far Western States a number of times, and then withdrew it and offered another one. That question was asked by Mr. STEENERSON in the hearings before our committee. The answer is:

Mr. WOOD. That is not so, Mr. STEENERSON. I might answer this along the line of my answer to your inquiry a while ago. There may be small post offices somewhere, special offices, or offices that have never had any regular mail supply and which are located many miles off the railroad; and in an effort to give those people service, and in the hope that we would get a bid at something like a reasonable rate, we have advertised for bids. Bids have come in calling for thousands of dollars, and we have not awarded the contract. Then we have readvertised in the hope that we would get a bid at a lower rate.

This is from offices paid from $20 to $30 a month, and the bid proposed was thousands of dollars, and, of course, it was rejected. For the information of the House I will put in the RECORD the star routes established and extended for the fiscal years 1914 and 1915, and those discontinued and curtailed. This is the statement:

Star routes established and extended.

NOTE.—Of the routes discontinued, 157, aggregating 1,433 miles, and 171, aggregating 1,498 miles, in 1914 and 1915, respectively, were discontinued on account of the extension of Rural Delivery Service.

While I am on the floor, in reference to the Rural Delivery Service I wish to say there has been manifested much impatience with the Post Office Department in the readjustments of these routes for the purpose of saving revenue. The department is of the opinion that it can administer this service, and not only maintain it but extend it, on $48,500,000 per annum. In order, however, that there may be no question about that, the committee, being anxious for this extension, did not accept the estimate of the department and put in the sum of $53,000,000 for rural routes.

Now, it is necessary, of course, when the department is readjusting the routes of the country, that Congressmen and their constituents should bear themselves with some degree of patience while the department is seeking to give to them the best possible service that can be given. It is clear that in the introduction of the automobile into the Rural Service and the doubling of trips on a great many routes it has been demonstrated that on a vast number of routes the service can be done as quickly and as effectively as before the number of routes was doubled at no greater expense than heretofore. Of course it will be observed that in many places, in many parts of the country, where the roads are not adequate for that kind of service, the experiment will be a failure. It is in many instances yet to be determined, and the department, therefore, must not only inaugurate the first experiment, preliminary to the change, but oftentimes, when it is found it does not meet the wants of the people, it must make a second and a third experiment; and I insist that the House ought to be patient while those experiments are being made on the part of the department to give the best results for the service. They have investigated many of the complaints that have been made. Many of them are conceded to be just, and there are many places where it is conceded that this service can not be established. I have received from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General a letter, which I ask the Clerk to read for the information of the House. I hope the Members of the House will be better satisfied, on hearing it, than they have been heretofore on the subject of rural routes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, February 1, 1916.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MOON: It is certain that if given time this department can eliminate every substantial objection to the new methods adopted for the collection and delivery of mail on rural routes.

Representatives of the department are now inspecting and adjusting the revised service in many localities, and will eventually cover all districts where any change has been made.

Our reports indicate that not only is the readjustment meeting with the unqualified approval of patrons who had been inconvenienced by the revision, but that we will be enabled to extend service to many who never had mail facilities, either before or after the recent revision.

The department desires to assure you, and through you any Representative in Congress, or postal patron, that wherever any alteration of rural-delivery service has occurred there will be a complete and satisfactory readjustment of the same in the immediate future, and we submit the following illustration:

About eight months ago the service was revised in the district represented by Hon. SAMUEL W. BEAKES, of Michigan, a member of the Post Office Committee, and 37 routes were discontinued, at an economy of approximately $40,000. About 450 families were inconvenienced through this revision; that is, they were compelled to relocate their mail receptacles at points anywhere from one-fourth to one-half mile from their domicile, where the mail had been delivered before the revision. After two readjustments of the revised service, I am pleased to state that there are but 10 families in the entire district who will be put to any inconvenience in the location of their mail receptacles, and 420 families, or about 2,100 patrons, have been provided with collection and delivery service which had, before the revision and readjustment thereof, not been afforded them. All of this was accomplished at a net saving in the annual operating expense of $27,500, which sum has been, or will be, utilized in the extension and improvement of the readjusted service in that district, or in establishing new service to not less than 5,000 families, or 25,000 patrons, at any point in the country where the department can locate the necessity for rural mail facilities.

This identical treatment will be accorded to every postal patron in any congressional district who was in anywise affected by the recent revision of the Rural Delivery Service.

Yours, very truly,
JAS. I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads suggests that we bear with patience the readjustment that the department is making, or seeking to make, in the Rural Mail Service of the country. Now, I share with the chairman the belief that the officials of the department sincerely desire to give the country good service, and while I know very little about it, I am willing to take it for granted that many of the readjustments that have been made are proper and warranted and that economies can be secured without serious inconvenience to the patrons in many cases. But I fear that the Postmaster General and those under him in making these readjustments have been a little bit too much disturbed by the fact that the postal revenues have been falling off and that there has been an increasing deficit in the postal revenues. The fact is the gentlemen said so much and patted themselves on the back so vociferously the first year of the administration when, inheriting the excellent methods of a Republican administration, they actually showed a surplus, that now when the thing has swung the other way, through no fault of theirs, perhaps, they fear they will be criticized if they are not very economical——

Mr. MOON. That surplus was shown for two years instead of one.

Mr. MONDELL. That shows how far the good influence of a Republican administration goes. [Laughter.] It can even inject itself into a Democratic administration for two years.

They have no doubt been trying to do the right thing, but they have been too much disturbed by the deficit, and I have sometimes thought that they were trying to save the entire deficit of $10,000,000 on the star routes of the mountain Commonwealth that I have the honor to represent on this floor.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman permit a statement?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. CRISP. I want to say to the gentleman that they have also operated in my district. I have had about 41 carriers let out.

Mr. MONDELL. Misery loves company. [Laughter.] I felt certain that the department was not singling me out as an example of the sort of lack of service that they can afford. I felt quite certain that we were getting quite as favorable consideration as any one. The trouble is they have been trying to economize all along the line, with the result that at least in the territory with which I am acquainted the department has not given us the service to which we are entitled. I say this without any thought of reflecting on the gentlemen of the department. They think they have been doing the right thing, but they are altogether too much impressed with the necessity, as it occurs to them, of being economical, when the fact is that all the American people ask of the Post Office Department is good service—good service as economically as good service can be had, but good service. Why, in my Mountain State we have lots of people who go 20, 30, or 40 miles for their mail. The chairman had read a letter with reference to people who had to go a quarter of a mile for mail. Why, in our country a man who only goes a quarter of a mile for his mail feels that he is living right in the post office. [Laughter]. They go 10, 20, 30, or 40 miles for mail, and when we ask for service in communities like that they begrudgingly and hesitatingly finally ask for bids; and if the bid for carrying the mail over a rough mountain road, or over a mountain pass, snowy in the winter and difficult at all times, is not as low as it would be in a good farming country with macadamized roads, they reject the bids and try it over again. Finally, after having the neighbors contribute to the carrier in one way or another so as to enable him to reduce his bid, we occasionally—just occasionally—get a new route for a service once a week.

Now, we are not asking for overmuch in the way of mail service out in that country, but we do feel that we are entitled to know we are under the flag and that we are in the domain of the Postal Service of the United States. Why, there have been routes discontinued in my State in the last two or three years that have been running for 10, 20, or 30 years, and no service has been put in operation to fully take the place of the service thus discontinued. It is a lamentable situation, which grows out of the erroneous notion on the part of officials of the Postal Department, that they must balance their accounts; that at least they must reduce as far as possible the deficit without regard to the service they render. The fact is this Post Office Committee ought to make it clear to the gentlemen of the Post Office Department—it can not be reached by law—that we expect to have all American citizens, wherever located, given fair postal facilities.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Has it not always been the policy of the Federal Government, up to the advent of the present administration, to send the mail to any settlement that gave promise of building up and developing?

Mr. MONDELL. Always, under all administrations, of all parties, up to the present administration.

But, Mr. Chairman, I did not rise for the purpose of discussing this postal bill. I rose to make a few observations with regard to some recent happenings.

My mind first goes back some weeks, when a considerable number of entirely proper gentlemen of more or less prominence and considerable affluence foregathered at one of the fashionable hotels of the city, under the alluring title of the National Defense League. As we all believe in national defense, of course we were all with them in spirit. They spent several days in a perfectly beatific communion, alternately thrilling and horrifying one another with lurid tales of impending invasion, outrage, and overthrow, and again reassuring and calming one another by stout and lusty, albeit somewhat Falstaffian pronouncements of great military establishments on land and sea. Having succeeded in thoroughly convincing one another that the world had relapsed and returned to a condition of absolute barbarism and had reverted to the conscience and the ethics of the stone age, amid mingled tears and condolences they adjourned. The next morning two of these gentlemen chanced to meet on the public street, and being still imbued with the heroic spirit of the occasion, they attempted to test immediately the question of preparedness by proceeding forthwith in good old cave-dwelling style to pummel each other's honorable and distinguished countenances. It was a perfectly lovely exhibition. It was peculiarly appropriate as the logical sequence of a meeting at which, without cracking a smile, these honorable gentlemen tolled the bells over the world's departed decency and conscience and announced a return to the most approved method of armed barbarism.

That was a sort of prologue. The first act occurred just yesterday. There was some considerable intermission, but yesterday the curtain rose on the departing form of a distinguished late Secretary of War, carrying under his arm his pet Pomeranian, the continental army. [Laughter.] In the foreground stood the President, deep in thought as to who should be selected now to carry on his programs for vast armies and armadas.

Of course, there are many different interpretations of what this all means, depending upon how you view the causes that have led up to this lovely condition of things. The little fisticuff on the street in front of the Metropolitan Club was the logical outcome of the meeting just dismissed, and the little misunderstanding between the President and a truly distinguished member of his Cabinet and an honorable gentleman was just as logical a development of the hysteria that has been sweeping over the country the last few months, which has been discussed under the catchy title of "preparedness." The Secretary of War has been dwelling in a purely military atmosphere. It is true he came to that atmosphere, as I have always believed, a virtuous citizen; but evil communications corrupt good manners and evil influences lead away even the best of men, and so the Secretary of War came to believe that the only way to protect these shores from dangers unknown and impossible, and yet terrifying to the timid, is by setting all our boys to toting arms and drilling and building up a great military establishment in the country. And the President, on the edge of the same kind of influence, came to believe that he believed the same thing that the Secretary of War did. In fact, he recommended the Secretary's plan in his late message—continental army and all. But there is one ray of light in this occurrence; the President, far as he has gone afield, as completely as he has turned his back on everything touching military affairs that he formerly believed and preached, has not got far enough but that he still hears a faint echo of what he used to believe.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. If the gentleman believed like the President does now, from the speeches he has just made in the West, that this country is in impending danger and great peril, do you not think we ought to make the necessary preparations to meet those dangers?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes. If I believed the country was in immediate danger and peril, I would call the boys out right now. I would not meet an impending danger, an imminent danger, with twenty-million-dollar battleships to be built six years from now.

Mr. QUIN. Yes; but that danger may be a continuing one.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes; it may be. The President said the other day that none of us could tell what a day would bring forth, and some people applauded that. They forgot that somebody said that several thousand years ago, and it was as true then and always has been as it is now. No doubt, my friend from Texas [Mr. DAVIS], who quoted the Bible in referring to me the other day, might be able to give us the exact place in Holy Writ at which I will find that. Of course we do not know what a day will bring forth. My dear friend, we may have an invasion from Mars. A few years ago there run through the magazines of the country the most lurid, frightful, and apparently plausible tale of overthrow that you ever read, and it was from Mars. Now, why did not we proceed forthwith to prepare against that invasion from Mars?

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. Understand, I felt about this matter just like you do, but since the President has told the people of all these dangers, I think we ought to prepare.

Mr. MONDELL. But the President has not told us of dangers. He has merely talked cryptically and suggestively of dangers. Whenever he has talked clearly, he has told us there were no impending dangers.

Mr. QUIN. I changed my mind about it. I believe what he said.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is very easily persuaded. [Laughter.] That is all I can say about that; and the President has not told us a blooming thing, with all due deference to the President. He has taken pains to tell us that we are not in imminent danger. He simply tried to put a scare in timid folks—I never before thought my friend from Mississippi was one of that sort—by saying that he did not know what a day will bring forth. Of course he does not. I know what a few months will bring forth politically. [Laughter on the Republican side.] But we do not, any of us, know what a few days or one day will any more than the President. The President says the world is on fire over yonder and that sparks are flying. If that is so, why does he not call out the fire department? [Laughter.] Why is he proposing to organize some fire companies and build some fire houses next year or a few years from now? That will not save us from these sparks.

Mr. QUIN. But he is trying to organize the fire department to put that fire out when it does come to us.

Mr. MONDELL. Did you ever hear about the fellow they told about in the old jingle? I have forgotten the way it runs, but he bought a clock and he wound it every day for 40 years and at the end of 40 years found out that it was an 8-day clock and that all his time had gone for nothing. Yes; it might be well to organize against the invasion from Mars that we read about a few years ago in the magazines. Nobody thought of doing it, because we were mostly sane then. It was just about as probable as anything we have to fear to-day in the way of invasion. If the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] will quietly retire to some place where he is entirely free from the contaminating influences of the miasma of militarism that is spreading abroad through the land, he will realize that is true now just as he realized it was true before—well, before the President persuaded him without saying much of anything. [Laughter.] The President and the Secretary of War split on what? On what is one of the most menacing features of this entire hysteria, the continental army, the continental army that nobody expects will be a success; that most everyone has admitted would fail, because the boys would not volunteer. Back of it stands the sinister figure of conscription, the conscription that must come or they believe would come if we were to start that kind of an army when the volunteers failed to come to the standards. They are sugar-coating conscription by calling it "universal service," and they are trying to make it palatable by likening it to the Swiss system, a system under which men, surrounded by the bristling bayonets of militarism, must and do give their time to the service of their country without pay. Do you think that American youths will do anything of that kind in time of peace? If you do, you know a different class of American youth than I am acquainted with.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MONDELL. Back of your continental army is conscription, enrollment, espionage, passports, a Federal officer standing at your shoulder wanting to know where you are going every time you get on a railroad train, compelling you to register every time you move from one part of the country to another—a system under which you will have all of the lovely conditions of repression and oppression which you have been inveighing against and condemning in every Fourth of July speech you ever made since you were old enough to make a Fourth of July speech.

Mr. QUIN. I think you are exactly right on that proposition about a continental army. Our committee has not found anybody that knows who is its parent. The President never has advocated the continental army.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has forgotten that the continental army is a part of the program proposed by the President in his message to this Congress. The gentleman can make a perfectly good speech, I know, but my time is limited. I am willing for the gentleman to ask a question, but I do not wish him to excuse himself for his position in my time. [Laughter.] The gentleman has powerful influences behind him, a large part of the wealth of the Nation, the metropolitan press, and he need not worry. Why, all he has to do is to play safety first. [Applause.] Yon can tell them you are following your President.

Mr. QUIN. That is right.

Mr. MONDELL. He can also point to gentlemen on the opposite side who take the same view. Those of us who do not follow and hang to the coat tails of Presidents and ex-Presidents, who still think as we did years ago, it is up to us to defend the faith that is in us and give the reasons for it. We still believe that this Nation, as a free Republic, can only live, flourish, and retain its principles by keeping free from great military establishments. That is our view. [Applause.]

The President, I hope, sees the shadow of conscription behind the continental army, and therefore he is unwilling to insist upon it. This, I hope, means the first break in the ranks of those who have been advocating all these things so foreign to our beliefs heretofore. All these things we have preached against and prayed against since we can remember. If there was ever a time when this people could safely continue its attitude of reasonable military establishment, a time when it was its duty to keep away from all plans and propagandas of enormous military equipment and enterprises, it is to-day: To-day, when Europe is sick and weary of war; to-day, when there is not a nation in Europe but what would conclude peace under almost any terms that would not be absolutely dishonorable and humiliating; a time when the air is full of rumors of offers of separate peace to Belgium; a time when the conqueror is sick of his conquest, tired, weary, willing to rehabilitate that people without requiring indemnity or retaining a fragment of sovereignty; this very day, when every warring nation in the world is thinking and hoping and praying for peace and would make peace if honors were more nearly even. In such a time as this, in this great Republic—whose influence is still great, notwithstanding our lack of vast military establishments, as shown by the deference paid us in our negotiations with all the nations of the world—it behooves us to be calm. This day, when the proudest military nation on earth is endeavoring to adjust her warfare to our views; this day, when the mistress of the seas is seeking for conditions under which she may allow our ships to plow the seas unmolested if she can do so without giving up what she considers her strongest weapon against the foe, is a time to be self-possessed. In these days, when we are approaching the time when weary, exhausted, war-sick nations of the world shall gather around the council tables to shape the conditions of peace, this is the time, as the President said to us a year ago from this very platform, to keep cool and continue on our way as a peaceful people, refusing to be carried off our feet by the hysteria of foolish and groundless fears into support of the plans of enormous military and naval establishments which have grown out of the desire of great corporations to continue and increase their profits and the influences they have been able to exert on well-meaning but misinformed and timid people. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL].

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for an appropriation for the Rural Free Delivery Service in the Post Office Department in an amount sufficient to give adequate and efficient service in this department.

At the beginning of the present Congress I introduced a resolution which had for its purpose the securing of facts upon which to base legislation affecting the recent changes in the Rural Service made by the Post Office Department. The ultimate object being to correct the errors of the department in its plan for reorganization of the rural-route system.

Prior to the recent reorganization of this department, so far as I have been able to learn, there was but little or no criticism of this service, and, judging from this fact, we must conclude that there was general satisfaction among the patrons of the rural routes.

In the State of Iowa these changes made by the department have very materially crippled the service—I might say have demoralized the Rural Free Delivery Service—and the patrons of these rural routes have made many and numerous complaints because of these changes. In the district I have the honor to represent the patrons of these routes have petitioned and appealed to me for relief. Believing that these petitions would receive favorable consideration at the hands of the postal department, I have presented them, calling the attention of the department to these complaints, but as yet I have been unable to receive from the department any consideration of these petitions and protests.

My first objection to these changes by the department is because, I believe, the changes were made without proper consideration of the subject and without proper information upon which to base these changes. When these rural routes were established by Congress some years ago I am advised it was the universal rule that the proposed routes were first examined and inspected by a competent person, and the routes were fixed and based upon the facts obtained by this inspection. The recent changes were made by the department, as I am informed, without even an inspection of the routes, and, as heretofore stated, without proper knowledge and information by the department of the facts and conditions in the territory where these routes were located.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman advise us who informed him?

Mr. DOWELL. The people living on the routes who have received their mail.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. DOWELL. I do not desire to yield, for I have just a few minutes of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. DOWELL. Before any changes were made by the department in this system, a careful inspection should have been made, and all of the facts should have been in the hands of the department. I am firm in the belief that if this had been done that many of the changes made by the department would not have been made. In other words, I can but believe that these changes were made without many of these facts, and without a proper consideration of these facts, and that by reason thereof the patrons of these routes were not fairly treated by this change, and they have thus been deprived of a splendid service which they had been receiving for many years before the changes were made.

In the State of Iowa we have a rich black soil. Many of our roads are dirt roads, and are composed of the same black soil. The moisture and the rain which nature has provided, and which is necessary for the bounteous crops raised in this State, cause the roads at certain times to become softened and heavy and not always easy of travel. During these times some of these roads are almost, if not quite, impassable by automobiles, and are heavy and difficult of travel by horse and wagon. My contention is, and I believe it is not a subject of controversy, that in making changes and mapping out these routes consideration must be given to all these conditions, and no system will be satisfactory which does not take into account all these facts and conditions.

It may be conceded that in sections where they have all hard-surfaced roads the Rural Mail Service can be carried on practically the same in all seasons of the year and in almost all kinds of weather, and when the time comes, if it does come, that all of our roads are hard surfaced, it may be an easy matter for a clerk in the department at Washington to sit in his office and make maps and blue prints fixing the rural routes of the country, and he may be able to measure them with some assurances of reasonable accuracy.

Every man of experience knows that under the conditions now existing in many of the States of the Union if a daily delivery of mails is to be had the length of the route must depend upon the condition of the elements, the condition of the soil, and the roads, and the condition of the hills, lowlands, and streams. No rural route should have been established or reestablished without all these things being taken into consideration. This, as I understand, was not done in the reestablishment of these routes.

In the State of Iowa, and in many of the States where the conditions are similar to the conditions in Iowa, automobile rural routes have been established, and the routes have been lengthened from approximately 24 miles to something like 50 miles or more. The routes which have not been changed to automobile rural routes have been lengthened and extended, many of them from approximately 24 miles to approximately 30 miles.

The petitions signed by a great number of farmers and business men clearly show that, because of the conditions and facts set forth in these petitions, the changing and reestablishing of the rural routes has greatly demoralized the service, and they believe it is impossible under the conditions to give them the daily mail service they have enjoyed for many years. These petitions specifically state what these facts and conditions are, and refer to the condition of the elements, the roads, the hills, lowlands, and overflowing of streams, and they should have received a fair consideration at the hands of the department.

I am calling your attention to this, gentlemen, that you may understand why many protests have been made to the department by the people of this section on account of these routes having been lengthened and extended. My contention is that under the existing conditions, as shown by these protests, during a part of the time at least, it is impossible to make the automobile routes. It is also impossible to make some of the other rural routes, where they have been extended beyond the limit a horse may travel on a heavy road. The result which must inevitably follow is that the farmers will not receive the daily delivery of their mail, as they have the right to receive it, and as it was the intention of Congress they should receive it when these rural routes were established.

It is the contention of the department, I believe, that these changes have been made in the interest of economy. I am glad to know that at least one department of this administration has given some thought to the question of economy. I am ready to join with the department wherever it may be done in an economical administration of the affairs of the department without injury to the service, but I will not join in any plan, under whatever name, and I must emphatically protest against any plan, which deprives the farmers of the country of a satisfactory and efficient free delivery service. These rural routes were established by Congress because of a demand by the people for this service, which service has not only permitted them to receive their daily mail, but to transact much of their business through the mails, and the business men and farmers alike are interested in maintaning this service.

Since this reorganization these protests have continued, and there is general dissatisfaction with the service. In other words, the service since the reorganization is just what the petitioners claimed it would be, inadequate and inefficient. With these petitions and protests on file, just why a great department of this Government should have continued in this blundering way to destroy a satisfactory service is unexplainable.

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, since the convening of Congress, has conducted hearings on this bill, some of them relating to the subject of rural service, and, together with others, I have presented such facts as I was able before this committee on this question, and the committee has received and compiled a great deal of evidence on this subject.

I notice from the report of the committee recommending this bill that the committee recognizes this blunder by the department in its so-called reorganization service. I quote from this report as follows:

> The increase of recommendations by the committee over the estimate of the department is due largely to the fact that the committee was not content with the appropriation of $48,500,000 for the maintenance and extension of the Rural Delivery Service, and increased the amount to $53,000,000 the same as occurred in the appropriation for 1916.

While the committee has not in specific terms recommended the restoration of the former service, we can readily understand from this report that the committee has recognized the reorganization plan as a complete failure.

The principal question is one of efficiency of service. The farmer is entitled to receive his mail at his door daily just the same as though he lived in the city and on the carrier's route of that city. This question has been settled and has been the policy of this Government and has been in operation for many years, and it is not now a subject for controversy. The question then arises, Has the present reorganization affected or materially injured this service? Everyone who reads the protests filed with the department, it seems to me, must know that the efficiency of this service has been greatly impaired by this so-called reorganization.

I want to call your attention briefly to some of the petitions and protests received relative to these changes:

ACKWORTH, IOWA, October 20, 1915.

We, the undersigned patrons of rural route No. 2, from Ackworth, in Warren County, Iowa, respectfully petition your honorable department that you leave the rural routes from Ackworth as they are now located and operated, and that the change contemplated by your department, to go into effect November 1, 1915, be not made, and for the following reasons:

1. That the proposed change and discontinuance of one of the routes will take the remaining carrier in a great many places from the main roads.
2. The proposed change will miss a large number of families now reached by the carriers and compel a number of families to go from 1 to 1½ miles for their mail.
3. The proposed route will take the carrier on byways in several places instead of on the main roads.
4. That it will often be practically impossible for carrier under the proposed change, considering conditions of the roads, to make the route.
5. That it is impossible in Iowa to successfully run in a motor vehicle.
6. That a considerable portion of the proposed route is over clay hills.
7. That only a small portion of the proposed route is over what is known as the county road system, and for that reason is not worked and kept in as good condition for travel as the county system.

ACKWORTH, IOWA,
November 25, 1915.

To the FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the patrons of R. D. No. 1, before the change on November 1, 1915, respectfully ask the department to arrange route No. 1 to go, commencing at center of west half section 19 and go east irregular to center of section 21, then north one-half mile, north and west irregular, then north to center of west line of section 16, then north and regular on old route. Commencing three-fourths of a mile west of Sandyville at near west line of section 21, then south one-half mile, west one-fourth, then south 1½ miles to center of east line of section 32, then 1 mile west to center of west line of section 32, then regular on old route.

This will give us earlier mail by our former carrier of Ackworth, as this is a good road and in good condition.

The parts marked out on map are very hilly byways; road is in bad condition and neglected.

It is impossible for the carrier to get over with car in wet times. But very little work is being done; some has not had any work for several years.

Only one patron takes daily paper, and only three boxes on the 2 miles from east line of section 19 south to west line of section 32.

The patrons farthest off the county road are three-fourths of a mile. The map will show the changes asked for, which will place more patrons on route.

The crossing on river at center of section 17 is in an impassable condition at present. In times of high water can not be crossed for several days—sometimes for a week or more.

(Signed by about 15 persons.)

ORILLIA, November 3, 1915.

Hon. C. C. DOWELL,
Des Moines, Iowa:

We have before us letter from J. K. Pickett, Acting Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, in reply to your letter concerning the petition from Orillia and Cummings, protesting against the change in the rural routes in the above-named places.

In Mr. Pickett's reply he gives us no satisfaction, and seems to know more about our requirements than we do ourselves. We still insist that this change is an act of injustice, and we would like to know wherein the department think they are bettering the service. We know the conditions of the roads here, know the number of patrons that are going to be greatly inconvenienced, and would be glad of the opportunity to show an inspector over the routes, that he might see conditions as they actually exist.

Mr. Pickett places special emphasis on economy, regardless of service. In this case we are paying for service and getting none. We expect to fight this to a finish, and insist that an inspector go over the routes.

(Signed by committee of five.)

ORILLIA, October 15, 1915.

We, the undersigned patrons of rural free delivery No. 1 from post office at Orillia, have been informed that the postmaster at Orillia has been notified by the department to discontinue the above-mentioned route on October 31, 1915. This is not satisfactory to us, and we consider it an act of injustice.

Whereas this above-mentioned route has been established for a number of years; in fact, it is one of the oldest routes in this section of the country, it being very favorably located, and covers a circuit on all sides of the office of about an equal distance in all directions. Under the proposed route starting from Cummings there will be 35 families that will not be satisfactorily served; and

Whereas under the present route now existing from Orillia post office these are all being served direct; and

Whereas the undersigned patrons of the above said route consider it an injustice, and that we are justified in making a demand that our present route be left as it now is, with one exception, and that you may add to it if the department so desires. We therefore appeal to you as our Representative to take this matter up with the department in our behalf, and expect favorable returns.

(Signed by about 150 persons.)

ORILLIA, IOWA, December 29, 1915.

Hon. C. C. DOWELL,
Des Moines, Iowa.

DEAR SIR: We acknowledge receipt of your letter of November 22 inclosing a letter from the Acting Fourth Assistant Postmaster General in reply to our second letter to you protesting against the action of the department in discontinuing the route from Orillia.

We have carefully read Mr. Pickett's letter and we fail to find any justification in claims made by him. He said the revision was made in order to suspend any unnecessary travel. Our answer to this is that not one foot of unnecessary travel was made by our carrier. He further says, without impairing the service of the patrons. If the department had this in view, they were simply undertaking an impossibility. Our proof of this is the condition now existing since they have put into effect the so-called revision, as we stated in our first letter, that the proposed route would greatly inconvenience the patrons, and we now say that it certainly has. In fact, it has deprived them of service altogether. Next, he says by the savings made by this so-called revision he can extend service to those who had none. But why deprive one man to serve another? We believe the farmers are entitled to have their mail delivered to their doors at least once a day in this change of service from Orillia to Cummings, and the weather and roads will be in a condition that he can cover all of his route all the time; they will not get this once-a-day delivery. At this time the road conditions are ideal and he does not get in in time for the mail to go out on the evening train, so his collection must be held over until the next day. One day since the change it rained and the carrier had to stay overnight 10 miles out in the country. The next day he cut out about half of the Orillia route. This is no fault of the carrier, he simply has a route that can not be covered in bad weather. Mr. Pickett says no injustice was intended to the patrons of Orillia, neither does he believe any was imposed by the change made. How he can make this claim is more than we can understand, for he is making a claim that is absolutely wrong, and we believe he is smart enough to know this, at least he ought to be, holding the position he now does. Where a number were receiving their mail at their door and are now cut out entirely, Mr. Pickett says that the department is anxious to know of the localities where service is actually needed. When you get to Washington just tell them that they need look no further than Orillia, and now, Mr. DOWELL, we know that we are justified in making the complaint; it is an injustice and unreasonable, and as we have said before, we are all up in arms and expect to fight to the last ditch. We believe that you are doing all that you can and thank you for same, and hope and believe that you will continue to do so after reaching Washington. Just say to the fellows down there that the farmers out here in Iowa think we know just as much about roads and weather conditions, and what a mail carrier can do and what he can not do, and what we are entitled to, as some clerk sitting in a warm office up at Washington; also say to them that there is another election coming and all parties are thoroughly disgusted with the radical mail change, and if we do not get what we need and ought to have now, we will after election. Thanking you again for your kind and valuable service.

Respectfully,

(Signed by a committee of three.)

NORWALK, IOWA, October 20, 1915.

We, the undersigned patrons of rural route No. 1 of Norwalk, have been informed that the Post Office Department has decided to consolidate the three routes of this place into two and a part of same into the Indianola, Iowa, route.

We would like for you to use your utmost influence in maintaining the present routes out of Norwalk, Iowa, just as they are, and give for a reason the following, and there is a number of other reasons not mentioned herein.

Route No. 1, for reasons is as follows: Do not want mail from Indianola, for the reason of poor roads, too far from post office, and not the trading point of any, or at least of a very few of the patrons of the route, and also the route would be too long for good service, as we believe.

(Signed by about 75 persons.)

NORWALK, IOWA, October 20, 1915.

We, the undersigned patrons of route No. 2 out of the town of Norwalk, hereby petition you to use your utmost influence in maintaining the above route out of Norwalk, Iowa, just as it now is, and give for our reasons, as follows.

We do not consider a change would give us good service, as we are now getting, and for a further reason it would so change matters that the patrons would be too far from their post office, and for a further reason the patrons would be getting their mail from a town not their trading point, which is very objectionable.

We earnestly solicit you to do all within your power to assist us in maintaining the above route just as we now have it, and feel and know that it is to the best interest of the patrons of the route.

We trust that you will not allow any time to be lost in seeing that we have that which we are entitled to in this matter, and that our present service is maintained.

(Signed by about 100 names.)

(Norwalk—Route No. 3.—The same petition was received, signed by about 100 persons.)

MILO, IOWA, December 6, 1915.

Hon. CASSIUS C. DOWELL,
Member Congress, Seventh District of Iowa:

Owing to the dissatisfaction of the former patrons of rural free-delivery mail service out of Milo, Iowa, we take this method of expressing to you our regret over the recent changes which were effective November 1, 1915.

We do, therefore, petition the United States Congress at Washington, D. C., through you, our Representative, to use all reasonable means to cause the said former rural free-delivery service at this place to be re-established and reinstate Lewis Daugherty to his position as carrier on route No. 1.

Also place James W. Estes on route 2 and Eugene Richmond on route 3, their respective routes.

(Signed by about 110 persons.)

MILO, IOWA, December 6, 1915.

Hon. C. C. DOWELL, M. C.,
Seventh District, Iowa.

DEAR SIR: Find inclosed herewith a petition praying for an act of Congress to revise the present rural-mail system which is going into effect in the State of Iowa. With the kind of roads—dirt roads I mean—we have in this country, no mail route should be more than 25 miles, and still better cut them to 20 miles. Reduce the carrier's salary to $800 or $900 per annum, and thereby give the rural district better mail all the year. Our carrier here can cover a 30-mile route on dry smooth roads, but he has to keep more horses and can't give as good service.

Talk about economizing if you must, but don't undertake to do it by weakening the Rural Mail Service. The farmer would not object to paying a higher rate on post-office mail matter, because he realizes that this class of mail is handled too cheaply. He doesn't care so much for the price, but he wants his mail every day regularly, and the only way to accomplish this is to shorten the routes.

If you want to see a man go in the air—to use slang phrase—just tell him his mail route has been changed so that he will be served from another post office than the one where he does his banking and other business. Just think of taking away from a family a thing that they have learned to believe to be their privilege, of having their mail delivered to them right at their door from what they consider their own town.

We have families living as far as 5 miles out that when the recent change went into effect they told us to keep their mail in the office and we will call for it, we don't want our mail to come to Lacona. Some have taken boxes, and others are going to drop their daily papers on account that they are 24 hours old when received.

There are so many arguments against recent changes and in favor of shorter routes that it would take a great deal of time to cover the whole ground in connection with the matter.

It is being claimed that there is no discrimination against certain towns and post offices. Take, for instance, the town of Milo, Iowa, which had prior to the recent change only three rural routes, and the little town of Lacona had five; now Lacona still retains her number and acquired 8 to 9 miles of Milo's most valuable territory, and Milo lost one route, leaving two, to Lacona five. Milo is located in and surrounded by a nice level country, while Lacona is located in and surrounded by a rough hilly country.

One Lacona route comes within 3 miles of Milo on one side and Indianola 1⅞ miles on the west side. If that doesn't place this office back in the fourth class it will be very strange.

The postmaster in Des Moines claims that these recent changes are a fine thing and everything will be all right as soon as we learn to take our medicine. (I don't know who told him to make the statement.) He also thinks that the country postmasters are responsible, because they recommended the change. Well, there is one that did not. Most emphatically no.

Whatever you do, work for the shorter route, and all the proposed changes should be thoroughly investigated before being ordered.

Very truly, yours,

W. B. DURHAM,
Postmaster.

TRURO, IOWA, December 28, 1915.

We, the citizens of Truro and surrounding vicinity, very much regret and protest against the rerouting of the rural mail system.

One route has been discontinued. A route coming through our town from the north and others from the west carry our heaviest mail to other towns. The routes are lengthened so that it is impossible to get good service. We feel that it is an injustice to the rural community surrounding Truro.

Therefore we petition you to use your influence to have it reconsidered and rerouted so that it will best serve the patrons of our town and county.

(Signed by about 300 persons.)

WAUKEE, IOWA, October 1, 1915.

Hon. C. C. DOWELL,
Seventh Congressional District, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: We, the undersigned patrons of rural route No. 2, being now served from the Waukee post office, learning that the said route is to be so changed as to be served from the Adel post office, respectfully ask that, if possible, you consider our objections to the said change for the following reasons:

First. A majority of us are much closer to Waukee, do our banking and general trading there, and often find it very convenient at times to call at the Waukee post office for our mail, when in town, which is often of considerable importance.

Second. Most of us now have our mail delivered in boxes at our farms, whereas if the contemplated change is made in route some of us would have to go from one-fourth to one-half mile to some corner or crossroads for our mail.

Third. In case of storms or impassable roads or other causes where carrier is unable to make the route, many of us could go to Waukee and get our mail, whereas the distance to Adel is such that we could not do so.

Fourth. Coon River would be between the proposed route and Adel, which, in case of high water, would make it impossible for vehicles to cross the bottom for days at a time, as it has been in the past.

(Signed by about 75 persons.)

WAUKEE, IOWA, October 1, 1915.

Hon. C. C. DOWELL.

DEAR SIR: In offering this petition for your consideration, we would emphasize objection 4 in petition relative to the Coon River, which again rose at Adel to such height as to make it dangerous and almost impassable, since we started this petition.

We have about seven-eighths of the patrons of route No. 2 attached to this petition. Those that did not sign it admit they get no better service, but do their banking and trading at Adel.

Hoping this will receive your favorable consideration,

Yours, respectfully,

JOHN LEWELLYN.

DALLAS CENTER, IOWA, October 5, 1915.

To the honorable POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the Panther Cooperative Association of Patrons of Route No. 3, out of Dallas Center, hereby protest against the change that is to be made cutting us off from the Dallas Center post office and attaching us to Adel.

There has been expended over $5,000 on the route between Panther, Iowa, and Dallas Center, and we believe that this route is much better than the proposed route from Adel.

The proposed route from Adel, passing over many byroads where in wintertime the roads are impassable, and we are afraid much of the time we will be unable to get our mail over the proposed new road from Adel to Panther store.

Respectfully, (Signed by about 35 persons.)

ANKENY, IOWA, October 29, 1915.

Hon. C. C. DOWELL,
Congressman from Seventh District of Iowa—Des Moines.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, being patrons of Rural Delivery Routes Nos. 1 and 2, out of Ankeny, Polk County, Iowa, do hereby most respectfully and emphatically protest against the proposed consolidation of these two routes, and the proposal to carry the mail over said proposed consolidated route by automobile. Our objection to this consolidation is based on the fact that during a large part of the winter months and during the rainy season of the spring it will be impossible, owing to the condition of the roads, for the carrier to make his trip with an automobile over this route with any degree of regularity, thereby delaying our mail service and at times discontinuing it altogether. We would further call your attention to the fact that owing to the length of this proposed consolidated route, it would be impossible for a carrier to make the trip in a day by means of horses. We therefore are asking you to use your influence against this proposed change and to present this protest to the proper authorities at Washington.

(Petition for Route No. 2 same as above.)

(Route No. 1, signed by about 50 persons; Route No. 2, signed by about 180 persons.)

INDIANOLA, IOWA, October 25, 1915.

Hon. CASSIUS C. DOWELL:

We, the undersigned patrons of rural route No. 4, Indianola, Iowa, having been informed that a change in schedule of that rural mail route will take effect November 1, 1915, and that the route, when changed, will either cut off or impair greatly the satisfactory mail delivery service which we have enjoyed for 14 years, respectfully ask you to take up the subject with the rural-service division of the Post Office Department and request them to allow the route to continue on the old schedule. Except go west 80 rods on south line of section 6, then north one-half mile, then east one-quarter mile to old schedule.

(Signed by about 40 persons.)

NEW VIRGINIA, IOWA, October 30, 1915.

Hon. CASSIUS C. DOWELL,
Des Moines, Iowa.

DEAR SIR: I wish to enter a protest against the change that has been made in our rural delivery service. And I voice the sentiment of the people in general in this country. The routes have been lengthened, making it impossible for the carriers to make the rounds in bad weather. You know the condition of the Warren County roads in bad weather. And I trust you will use your influence to have a change made in the near future that will give us better service.

Yours, very truly,

HARLOW MILLS.

PATTERSON, IOWA, November 9, 1915.

FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We the undersigned are now patrons of the Patterson post office, and we are writing you a protest against being put on the Winterset routes on December 1, 1915. We do our trading here at Patterson and come here, the majority of us, almost daily and can get our mail when here, and we seldom go to Winterset.

(Signed by about 30 persons.)

PATTERSON, IOWA, November 9, 1915.

FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Division of Rural Mails, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We the undersigned are now patrons of the Winterset and St. Charles post offices, and we petition your honorable body to permit us to receive our mail from the post office at Patterson, Iowa.

(Signed by about 20 persons.)

WOODWARD, IOWA, December 29, 1915.

Hon. CASSIUS C. DOWELL,
Representative from the Seventh Congressional District,
Des Moines, Iowa:

We the undersigned patrons of rural route No. 2, Woodward, Iowa, some months ago petitioned the Postmaster General for a change in part of the route of carrier No. 2, from Woodward, by which said carrier would, by leaving the present route at the middle of the west line of section 36 and going in either direction around section 1, Des Moines Township, Dallas County, Iowa, and the south half of section 36, Peoples Township, Boone County, Iowa, give 12 families front-door mail service, which families at present are one-quarter to three-quarters of a mile from their mail boxes.

We feel that in rejecting our petition the Postmaster General did not fully understand the merits of our petition, and feel that if this is awarded us we are receiving only what we are fairly entitled to.

We desire your earnest support and assistance in this matter.

(Signed by 12 persons.)

COLO SAVINGS BANK,
COLO, IOWA, February 5, 1916.

Hon. C. C. DOWELL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At the request of Mr. J. D. Lounsberry, one of our farmer friends, who circulated the inclosed petition, we are forwarding same to you. This petition is signed by representative farmers and business men of this community, the larger part of the signers being farmers who are affected by the change in mail service. I can assure you that there is genuine dissatisfaction with the change in mail routes at this point, and anything you may do to help relieve the situation will be appreciated by the patrons here.

Yours, very truly, C. W. YEAGER, Cashier.

COLO, IOWA, February 5, 1916.

Hon. C. C. DOWELL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned voters of Story County, patrons of the Colo, Iowa, post office, and business men of the town of Colo, respectfully request that you use your influence to have the Postmaster General reconsider his order to abandon one rural route out of Colo, Iowa.

Considerable time and money have been spent to get the route roads in good condition, a number of patrons of the office and customers of the town are forced to get their mail elsewhere, making it inconvenient for the patron as well as being a detriment to the town. The rural mail service from Colo was entirely satisfactory prior to the change, but under the new arrangement many patrons who have received their mail from the Colo office for years, living close to Colo, are compelled to get their mail on the Nevada routes or not have their mail delivered. Many are refusing to have their address changed on account of doing all their other business in Colo, and call for their mail at the office. Under these circumstances the new arrangement is found unsatisfactory and we herein voice our urgent protest against the change.

(About 225 persons.)

These protests have all been filed with the Post Office Department, and, so far as I know, have resulted in no changes by the department from the original plan. These protests are not made without cause. Neither are they made because of any disposition on the part of the signers to criticize or object to an economical administration of the affairs of this department. But they are made because of an honest belief, and because of evidence upon which to base this belief, that they can not and will not receive efficient service under the present change of the rural routes.

In addition to the complaints I have referred to, which are conclusive in showing the absolute failure of this reorganization plan, there is one other distinct protest which applies to many of the changes made by the department. I refer to the arbitrary change by the department of the post office address of many patrons of these routes. To illustrate, one town in my district had but one rural route of about 24 miles in length, which circled about the little town. The recent change by the department took this route from this little town and transferred it to a town some miles away, thus changing the post-office address of the citizens living about the town.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. I only have just a few moments.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will give the gentleman more time.

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. STEENERSON. I want to know the name of the town?

Mr. DOWELL. The town is Orillia, Iowa. I want to say to the gentleman there are a number of places in the district I have the honor to represent where the post-office address of persons has been changed from the town near which they live—sometimes at the very edge of the town—to one some miles away.

Under similar circumstances, this change of post-office address has occurred in many places, as is shown in these petitions and protests. And these citizens are not permitted to get their mail from the town or village they are contributing to build up and support.

It is the numerous communities which make up this great Republic of ours, and it should be the aim and purpose of every department of the Government to cultivate and encourage the building up and improvement of these communities.

The taking away of the rural route from these communities and the changing of the post-office address to a city or town many miles away has a tendency to destroy the community interest, and the people have the right to protest against any system or plan which has a tendency to destroy this community interest. And they have the right to protest against the arbitrary change of their post-office address from the town they are helping to build up and improve. Every individual, I believe, is and ought to be loyal to his own community, and I am proud to know that these petitions and protests maintain this loyalty.

In conclusion let me say that the farmers have the right to insist that the Post Office Department in fixing these routes give to them the same consideration that is given to the merchant or the man living in the city. This is all they ask, and this they are entitled to receive. And I maintain that a fair consideration of these petitions and protests and the facts presented therein will restore the rural routes to where they were prior to the present change and will restore to them a good and satisfactory service. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to print therein the petitions to which I referred.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with those gentlemen who are troubled by their constituents about routes; but, as I remarked a while ago, gentlemen ought to be patient about these changes. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] knows that there are many thousands of routes in the United States, and that there has been an adjustment of seven or eight thousand of those routes in the interest of the public, as the department believes, and a saving of an amount of money that enables the administration to say that rural routes can be conducted for four and a half million dollars less than heretofore. But the committee are not willing to make a reduction in this service. They have not done so. We fix the sum at $53,000,000. The gentleman ought to know that with all of these routes that the readjustment can not be made in every State at once. He is complaining of Iowa. Let us see what the facts say about that State. Here is a statement showing by States the extension of the rural route service from March 1, 1913, to November 8, 1915, and the discontinuance and curtailment of routes:

There is not a change of more than 5 miles in a particular route from any of these towns as reported by the department.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The report only brings it down to November 8. I would like to know why you stop at that date?

Mr. MOON. That was about the beginning of the time of this Congress. Reports could not have been made very much later.

Mr. RAMSEYER. In my district there were 16 routes discontinued and 63 extended, and nearly all of that was done since November 8.

Mr. MOON. Possibly that may be so. Now, as I said before, here is the readjustment after the beginning of this Congress. There is the letter from the department saying that they are proposing to readjust, not only once but twice, so as to make these matters entirely satisfactory to you. Do you think that all routes can be adjusted in five or six weeks? Gentlemen should learn some measure of patience about this matter.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does the gentleman contend that a discontinuance or extension of a route can be made by following the maps in the office and without sending an inspector over the routes?

Mr. MOON. Of course, I do not contend that a route that has not been inspected could be so laid out by blue prints in the office, and the fact is that there has not such a thing been done, no matter what any gentleman says here. Those routes have, every one of them, been inspected time and again. It may be true that after the inspection was made and the diagram of that route made that some changes were made in it without a reinspection. That is perhaps the cause of complaint of some of you gentlemen.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Oh, no; you would not yield to me a while ago. I would be glad to yield to you if you had yielded to me then.

Now, it would be impossible for the department to make all of these readjustments at once. Of course everybody is more or less dissatisfied with changes, or somebody is more or less dissatisfied with changes on routes. Now, if you gentlemen will go down to the department and file your complaint, as many of you have done, in due time an inspector will be sent there to ascertain whether you are correct in your contention or not, and if you are, the matter will be remedied, and if it requires a second inspection to do it that will also be granted.

You heard a letter from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General read, in which he explained the manner in which the adjustment had been done in one congressional district in Michigan, and how entirely satisfactory it was, and how much money had been saved by reason of it. Now, that will occur with you all in due time. I do not blame you for talking here for home consumption on that matter, but we are transacting a little business in this House on that question, and you have to wait and have patience. You can not have this change all at once. These routes will be adjusted. You will be attended to in time.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I am not talking for home consumption; I am asking for information. We have 32 protests in the Post Office Department now, and I hope they will be around and inspect the routes. But I do know from information I have from my district that there has not been a single route inspected within a year.

Mr. MOON. It does not need it within a year. Does not the gentleman understand that an intelligent official does not have to inspect a route every year? There was an inspection made when the route was laid out, and there was another inspection when the route was put in, in order to readjust the trouble. Those routes are all inspected. Even if a part of them had been changed from the blue print, and it has brought trouble, that can be corrected by an inspection as soon as the inspectors can get to it, as the department says. When you explain these matters to your constituents I do not think you will be troubled further with it. I know you have done all you could, and if there is a complaint you have put it right.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes, sir; we have.

Mr. MOON. And the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] is in a little trouble the same as you have been in—maybe more trouble. But I am satisfied they are going to be treated exactly as they have been treated in Michigan, when they get to them.

Mr. HOWARD. It is true, as the gentleman says, there has been a good deal of trouble with the adjustment in the State of Georgia than in the States of these other gentlemen.

Mr. MOON. Georgia is the worst State as far as that is concerned. They have been raising so much corn and cotton on the old roads that they had to go through cotton fields there to establish a new route.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir. They have had to pick cotton there in order to get through with the mails. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOON. And they were so anxious to make money on the cotton after the readjustment that they put the old roads into cotton fields.

Mr. HOWARD. There is no complaint on that. It is just the activity of the department to give efficient service.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Do I understand the gentleman to say there has been no complaint in the State of Georgia?

Mr. MOON. The gentleman did not understand me correctly. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] has complained more than all of you put together.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I understood the gentleman from Georgia to say that Georgia had not complained.

Mr. MOON. Georgia has complained. All of you gentlemen will be looked after. Just be patient.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I propose to talk a little on the rural free delivery, and especially the rural free delivery in the district which I have the honor to represent. The first notice that was received of any change in the rural delivery in the district came on the 22d day of November, when I was called by telephone and informed that there had been a notice of a change of the Rural Free Delivery Service in the town of Somerset, which is located on the west side of Taunton River opposite the city of Fall River, where I reside, and that the carrier had been notified that his services would be no longer required, giving him notice that changes to be effected there would go into operation on the 30th day of November.

I made some inquiries as to what was being done, as I had not previously heard anything about it, and the postmaster of Somerset did not know anything about these changes until he got the official notice, nor did the carrier know anything about it. To this day the carrier has never received any notice except the one which he received from the postmaster at Somerset. The department never sent any notice to this carrier that he was to be retired. He received the cold-blooded notice from the postmaster that on the 30th day of November his service would no longer be required.

Now, what did they do with the town of Somerset—a town that has grown rapidly, as shown by percentage of growth, more than any other town in my district outside, of course, of the city in which I live, which has grown still more rapidly?

The division of that town was made by going through what is called Center Street and taking all postal territory north of Center Street and placing it under rural free-delivery carrier in the town of Dighton, and further notice was given that all mails in this section of Somerset would be sent to the Dighton post office. All territory south of Center Street was taken from Somerset and placed in the town of Swansea, and notice was given that on and after November 30 the carrier from Swansea would bring from Swansea the letters addressed to those individuals, who had received for more than 12 years, since the Rural Free Delivery Service was established, their mail from the town of Somerset, where they reside.

Now, Somerset has some important business interests. Some of the business men had their letterheads prepared and proceeded to do business under the advantages that they obtained from the successful carrying on of the rural carrier service and the increased service of the parcel post. They felt that that service would be a permanent aid in the successful establishment of business, which would give to themselves and their families more of the comforts of life than they had formerly enjoyed. The people living in the country towns were thereby encouraged to establish various lines of business, and they proceeded to do this, because in that way they could earn a little better living than they had been having the opportunity to obtain by reason of work on their farms.

That change of the Rural Free Delivery Service came as a surprise to me. I was compelled to say in answer to inquirers, "I absolutely know nothing about it." My constituents were calling me constantly over the telephone and telling me what was happening all over the district. Later in the day the people from South Westport called me up and told me they had received notice that their office was to be changed, and that their delivery was to be practically destroyed and made useless. They said, "We are going to hold a public meeting down in the village of South Westport to-night, and we would like to have you attend that meeting." They said, "We will send up an automobile for you." I do not happen to own one. They said, "We will take you down and bring you back."

I went down, and when I arrived there I found, in a nice little Quaker meetinghouse, a number of infuriated citizens, who met there and related to me their sorrows and troubles over these rural free delivery changes. My friend and colleague from the sixteenth district [Mr. WALSH] was affected like myself, because some people in his district, which immediately adjoins mine, were affected by the changes that were made as to the delivery of their mail.

After we arrived there there was some considerable talk among the citizens as to the disadvantages under which they would suffer by the proposed changes, and there were some rural free delivery carriers there. Some of the gentlemen said: "Let us call on the rural free delivery carriers to tell us how this affects us and what their position will be." I presided at the meeting, and I said: "Why, you do not want to call on these carriers. They are in the executive department of this Government, and if they tell what they know they will probably get themselves into trouble. But, thank God, I am a free Representative of the people, and I am under no obligation to the Executive department. I am a part of the legislative department, and I can say what I please and do whatever I please, because I am responsible to the people I represent and not subject to official dictation."

The citizens present explained very fully the unfortunate predicament in which they would be placed and the great financial loss to which they would be subjected, and finally, after the situation had been talked over and my eloquent friend here on my right [Mr. WALSH], who can talk much more eloquently than I can, had told these people what we would try to do for them, I said I would send a dispatch to the Post Office Department, telling the department what the situation was, and we would see if we could get any kind of response from the department. I will read to you the dispatch which I sent that night after I arrived home and before I went to bed at midnight. This is the dispatch that I sent:

Citizens of the district I represent, in mass meeting assembled at South Westport, are bitterly opposed to orders that have been issued overthrowing the Rural Delivery Service. They and constituents elsewhere ask that the date named when orders shall be effective be postponed until an investigation can be made. In many cases important business interests will be seriously affected by the proposed changes. I shall be in Washington on December 2, and desire to confer with you upon the vital questions involved.

Now, at South Westport there happened to be one woman who was secretary of the Women's Christian Temperance Union and a number of other affiliated organizations, and she stated that she had sent out herself personally nearly 800 letters during the last year, and had received 800 replies that came back to South Westport, and that under the change, as proposed by this route, their conveniences would practically be destroyed. Several gentlemen, under the inspiration of the Rural Free Delivery Service and the advantages which they had enjoyed, had established the business of selling young chickens—mind you, this route had been in operation for 16 years—and they had sold over 17,000 chicks annually that had been sent out by means of the parcel post and also under the advantages of Rural Free Delivery Service, and besides the chicks thousands upon thousands of dozens of eggs; and under the change made by this proposition their mail facilities would be very seriously disturbed. I just heard the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads tell Members to be patient. You can not be patient when you get notices throughout your entire district that in eight days they are going to tear the postal facilities in your district all to pieces, so far as rural delivery is concerned. You can not be patient when your carriers are notified that in eight days their services will be dispensed with—not in consequence of notices sent to the carriers themselves, but notices sent to the post office, where the postmaster simply tells the carriers that they are to be discharged. Some of the carriers had bought automobiles, and now that they have been removed from the service they have the machines on their hands, and in many cases they have families to support without any means of permanent employment.

Mr. McKENZIE. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. McKENZIE. I should like to ask the gentleman whether or not this change was brought about by the improvement of the highways in this district?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. The highways in the district which I have the honor to represent have always been good. Some of them possibly are not yet put in the condition that they ought to be. Massachusetts is a progressive State, and we are constantly improving in everything that we can. But let me tell you straight—and what I tell you is the fact—that the people who live in these country towns, who for from 12 to 16 years have had service once a day and have had the enjoyment of these privileges, feel that they are entitled to them, and they feel, furthermore, that when they come up to the city in which I live and where most of them trade and find that we get four and five deliveries a day, while we do not pay any more toward the support of the Government proportionately than they do, they feel that to deprive them of these rights is an outrage upon them. Furthermore, the changes that were made took from them the evening paper that was of as much value to them as the mail. By the change they would get the evening paper the next day. One gentleman was asked if they could not read it then. He replied, "We farmers work all day, and we could not read it until the next night, and then the day had gone by, the paper was old, and was of no value in a live community. They wanted the daily paper that gave them the market reports every night, so that they would be prepared to know what price they should ask for the goods that they send out in the morning mail."

This change in the district that I represent has so thoroughly demoralized nearly every route in the district that nobody gets a service that is worth counting as a convenience at all.

Mr. MOON. I want to ask if the roads in the gentleman's district are of such a character that an automobile could make a trip of 35 miles and back and give the service to the people to which they are entitled?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes; but there are many places in my district that are not so situated that you can do that, and there are plenty of places in my district that could be reached that are not, although petitions for extensions have remained many months at the department without any consideration or report.

Mr. MOON. You would not object to any rural delivery system, however long the route might be, by which your mails could be delivered and you could have a proper and efficient service for your people?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. No; but we have not the service now, and the people are deprived of the good service they have long enjoyed by the rash and hasty action of the department.

Mr. MOON. You would not object if you had it so adjusted?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I would want to see what the adjustment was before I would think of indorsing it. All this humbug does not amount to anything.

Mr. MOON. Is not the trouble about the whole thing largely due to the fact that in the readjustment of the service, while it may be disturbed temporarily until there can be a full and complete readjustment, there will be a reduction of the number of carriers. Is not that the trouble?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. No; and before I get through I will tell the gentleman something.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman answer that question?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. That is not the fact, and I will prove it to you in a few moments.

Now, the department without investigation, on the strength of the trouble that these people made in that little Quaker meetinghouse, changed the service to suit those people that complained, but in doing so they overturned all the other routes in the town. There was the greatest disturbance you ever saw. The people said to me, "Here, you went down to South Westport where those folks held a meeting and you fixed it for them. See if you can not fix it for use." I said, "I will try. I will tell you what I will do."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I shall need more time than that. I have not begun yet.

Mr. MOON. I will give the gentleman some time if he needs it.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I want to tell you something about the conditions. In addition to the rural free-delivery service at the town of Westport, we have rural free-delivery service at South Westport. There is also rural free-delivery service at North Westport and other parts of the town unprovided for. The citizens of the central town of Westport sent me a number of letters which I filed with the department. Each one of those letters explained the situation as it really was. I sent those letters to the department, telling them how ridiculous it was to change rural free-delivery routes without an investigation. The department told me they had changed them on their route map in the office. They told me that when I called at the department in December last. They had the route maps out and showed me. They said, "Here is where your route goes." I said, "I don't want to be bothered with anything of that kind. Send a man on to the ground and let him see what is there." Now, let us see what happened afterwards. I had a number of letters which I filed. They had no more effect than it would have to throw a pail of water out of the window. They never paid any attention at all to those letters. I present here a copy of letter from a gentleman who had established a business in the town of Westport:

(John Allen poultry farm. Rhode Island Reds. The best business breed. Established 1901.)

WESTPORT, Mass., February 2, 1916—8 a. m.

Hon. WILLIAM S. GREENE.

DEAR SIR: This letter, if placed in my mail box before 11 a. m., will be taken to South Westport to "spend the day" and also to "spend the night," leaving for New Bedford at 8.30 a. m. to-morrow morning.

Under the former schedule the letter would leave Westport (from my box) at 2 p. m. same day as mailed and reach New York before it now leaves Westport.

Mind you, he had to mail his letters three hours earlier than under the former schedule in order that the mail might slumber at South Westport all the afternoon and all night in order that the carrier might take the mail from South Westport at 8.30 o'clock a. m. the next day.

Will you please insist that this particular route be at once readjusted so that all patrons may be served justly? As it now stands part of the route gets cream and over half gets skim milk.

Yours, truly,

JOHN ALLEN.

Now, that is the way the routes are generally throughout my district. Some of them get pretty good service. The people of South Westport waked up very quickly, and they found that if they did not bestir themselves they would be just exactly where the town of Westport now is. And some of the people of the town of Westport who were at the meeting that night said, "If they make these changes, we shall be just where South Westport is by the changes the department has already made." It emphasizes the fact that changes can not be properly made without proper investigation and inspection.

So there is the situation. Those are the real facts as they exist. Sixty-six different box holders stated that they were in the same position as Mr. Allen was.

I sent the letter of Mr. John Allen to the department, and here I have the department's reply:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, February 7, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM S. GREENE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. GREENE: In reply to your letter of the 4th instant, transmitting a communication addressed you by Mr. John Allen, of Westport, Mass., protesting against the mail service afforded patrons of former route No. 1 from that office, but now served from South Westport, and requesting that the situation be remedied, I beg to state that this matter is to be made the basis of personal investigation by a representative of the department.

Sincerely, yours,

JAS. I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

Now, friends say, "that is all right," but the "all right" part would have been if it had been done before they did the damage. These people are suffering now for the lack of a proper mail service. The chairman of the committee has said in his remarks here, "Why are you not patient?" I say, why was not the Post Office Department a little patient, instead of destroying the usefulness of every route in the district eight days before we assembled here, and doing that without conferring with me, without conferring with a single patron, without trying to see what the effect would be?

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. I should like to ask the gentleman whether he wants us to understand that the Post Office Department in the past, in order to economize in the rural free delivery of the Government, has taken down the map of certain townships and counties and simply marked out the routes in the office without sending an inspector out to see what the effect of that action would be?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I will state this: That every rural free delivery route in my district, and I have been a Member of this House for more than 17 years, was established by capable inspectors, and in many cases I accompanied the inspector when the routes were established, and those routes were established for the purpose of allowing the people who lived in these county towns to have their mail go out of their towns in season to give them the practical advantages of modified city delivery; and now there is no advantage in the propositions to which they have been subjected, because the routes have been altered without personal inspection, nor has an attempt to provide convenient mail connections been undertaken. That is the point. The fact is the department has not a supply of experienced inspectors to do this work. They are now map examiners in the department. They have dismissed all of the experienced inspectors they had up in my section of the country. Let me give you an actual illustration.

One of the inspectors that lives in my district, who has been 30 years in the service and was a very capable man, was called upon one day by a committee that was looking around to find some holes where they could put some new men in as inspectors. They called upon him and said, "Now, look here, we want you to resign." He said, "What for?" and they said, "You have disobeyed the rules of the department." He asked them in what particular, and stated that he had been in the service for 30 years, and was not aware of having broken any rules. They said to him that on a certain day he had investigated an office in North Dighton. He said, "Yes," that he had; and they then said that in that investigation of the office there was one letter in the free delivery that had been there longer than the regulations of the department required and that he failed to report that the letter was in the general delivery.

He replied, "I can explain some of the circumstances in regard to that. The North Dighton office had been broken into twice, and I had been down there to investigate, and when it was broken into the second time I was sent for post haste to go down there to see if I could not find some evidence on which I could trail the robbers that broke into the office and opened the safe. I went there and went through the office solely for the purpose of obtaining evidence regarding the robbery, and, as I had other important employment, did not make a special inspection of the general delivery that day." They then said to him that that was a violation of the rules of the department, and that he could either tender his resignation or that they would recommend his removal for inefficiency. The man said, "I have been in the service for 30 years, and I would rather retain my reputation than to be recorded dismissed, and I will resign and leave the service." Of course that made a place for somebody else, just what they were looking for. They had a committee of three, a smelling committee, that came up from Washington to smell around, and they smelled out all of the post-office inspectors in the State of Massachusetts, competent men, capable of establishing rural free delivery routes, capable of examining post offices and deciding when improvements should be made, and in every way capable for the transaction of public business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I thank the gentleman. I knew these post-office inspectors; and I have known them for years. They were all capable of doing good business, this man especially, for he had been efficient in every way. I speak from knowledge, because I was the postmaster of my city from 1881 to 1885. My father was the postmaster from 1875 to 1881, and when his health failed I was selected as his successor and held the office until 1885; and then 22 days after Grover Cleveland became President of the United States my term of office expired and I stepped out—glad to do it. But I came back again in 1898 as postmaster, and during all that time, the post office being right across the street from my office, and being familiar with all of the men who held the office, I was in and out there; and I claim to be an expert in post-office business. I know something about it. The postmaster that I recommended nine years ago will, within a very few days, turn the office over to his Democratic successor, leaving behind him a record that will compare favorably with any record made by any man in the post office from Maine to California, from New York to San Francisco.

His term expired last December, and he has been ready to retire when his successor is prepared to qualify. I do not find any fault, for I believe in changing these political offices when we change political parties [applause], and I shall be ready to make the changes next year, when we get back into power, and I will help to do it if I am alive and have my health. I believe in letting officials serve until their term is completed. The post offices in my district have been absorbed, wiped out; carriers discharged without reason, and the service, according to the testimony given by the parties themselves, and the Rural Free Delivery Service is largely good for nothing as at present carried out.

I have another letter here from a gentleman which I received a few days since. He has written me a number of letters, and I have filed them with the department, but found that they were not very effective. He wanted to know what else he could do, and I said I did not know. He then asked me if I wanted a petition sent, and I said, "No; there would be no use of a petition. It would be simply a waste of time." Here is what he sent me:

SOMERSET, MASS. (our real address), February 8, 1916.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN GREENE: On behalf of the citizens of Somerset I wish to extend hearty thanks for your kind help in calling attention at Washington to our disturbed mail service. We do and always shall appreciate your unremitting efforts on our behalf.

To show that we have by no means given up hope of having our rural free-delivery route returned to us before long, I am inclosing a petition signed by 235 patrons of our rural free-delivery route. Will you be good enough to hand the same to Mr. BURLESON and assure him that Somerset wishes beyond all things to keep its name on the postal map of Massachusetts?

Very truly, yours, ERNEST COBB, Secretary.

To-day Somerset is unknown as a postal center. The postmaster has had his business taken away from him. The one rural free-delivery route has been split up in pieces and passed over to two other towns without reason, without excuse, without any charge against the rural free-delivery carrier, without any charge that he has been negligent, but with a spirit which I fail to understand, as I have said very plainly. I do fail to understand how any post-office department in the civilized country of the United States, made up of men born in the last half century or within the last century, can so distinctly go into a proposition as to disturb a satisfactory mail route for what they say is the purpose of saving the paltry sum of $5,000,000. When I was postmaster, and I was postmaster for one term and part of another until I was called down here, as I have said, I always found that when the people had the conveniences they wanted and needed they did not try to see whether the Post Office Department was paying or not; and I think to-day that out of the 100,000,000 people of the country there is hardly a man among them who cares whether the Post Office Department pays or does not pay.

They are very much more concerned in being provided with good service, so that in case of emergency, extreme sickness, or death they shall have the opportunity to have a prompt delivery of letters that they deposit in the post offices of the country or in street letter boxes in cities or in rural free-delivery boxes in the country.

The people who have their chosen Representatives in this building do not want their Postal Service hampered by unjust interference with their rights and privileges by orders from their official servants who temporarily occupy positions of executive authority. The executive departments have their limitations. But they should understand they are not the law-making power, but they are to execute the laws created by the Congress and approved by the President.

The Post Office Service has grown to wonderful proportions. It is of immense value. It is more valuable to-day than it ever was, and when the people are deprived of the privileges that they once enjoyed and that they have especially enjoyed during the last 15 or 16 years, when they are ruthlessly deprived and wronged in their service, they are indignant, and so indignant that when they come to vote next November they will not blame the Representatives for losing their routes, because they realize that my colleagues and myself have tried to have their privileges restored. I will put in the RECORD and now ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD by putting in the routes that have been changed and the methods of change and the destruction of the carriers. Now, I will bring you a little illustration of one of my towns where a carrier was obliged to give up on account of ill health. The department had no substitute in line to put in his place. I sent one carrier who had been thrown out in the cold by reason of changes in another part of the district and he was assigned to duty temporarily, but his service was continuous. He has performed the work satisfactorily, but now the department has begun an examination to fill a vacancy there, notwithstanding this carrier, who had given good service when thrown out of employment by this unwise consolidation of postal districts. He is liable now to be thrown out entirely and a civil-service examination held to fill the place he now holds as a civil-service employee. Why he could not just as well have continued his service where he is employed, although it is on a route different from that he carried originally, as to have some one come in there and take it entirely out of his hands, I do not know. I am at a loss to understand the methods of the department, but I believe that they have not realized the great growth of the Post Office Department, the great growth of the business of the department and the advantage there is in the prompt delivery of letters, in having them delivered without delay, and the advantage that is in a business and social sense.

These changes that have been made destroy the social centers, deprive the people particularly of receiving their correspondence promptly, and if anybody has any merchandise sent to them now where these routes have been changed, from business houses or elsewhere, they have to go and hunt up their missing packages and spend a day or two trying to find them, and then they have to pay extra postage to have their second-class mail forwarded. There is absolutely no excuse for this utter demoralization of the rural service in the district which I represent, and I take that as a fair sample that there is no excuse for it anywhere. Take the paltry sum of $5,000,000 to spread over the United States which they claim they save by this process, why it is not anything to be considered when the service is depreciated at all. Even if they save $5,000,000, people in small towns want their service. Maybe in some of the departments they may have men employed who do not appreciate the value of a letter, do not know anything about the real benefits of the service, but my constituents want good service. They have had the service for 16 years; and to have it demoralized by unwise action on the part of the Post Office Department is wrong in principle, and unless prompt action is taken to change existing conditions, the dissatisfaction of patrons of the Rural Free Delivery Service will continue to multiply with results that can only be prophesied but not foretold. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, availing myself of the privilege granted me, I submit the following information regarding other rural free delivery routes in my district:

The city of Attleboro has four rural free delivery routes, and one rural free delivery route from Rehoboth has been transferred to Attleboro and the Rehoboth carrier has been dismissed.

The rural free delivery route from Somerset was divided into two parts, one being transferred to Swansea and the other to Dighton. Somerset had excellent steam railroad facilities and ample mail service. No advantage to patrons accrued.

The rural free delivery route from Myricks was divided into two parts and the carrier was dismissed; one part going to Assonet and the other to Taunton. Myricks post office was located at the junction of two railroad divisions and its mail service was excellent.

The rural free delivery route from Lakeville was transferred to and absorbed by Middleboro and the Lakeville carrier was dismissed. Lakeville post office is located opposite the railroad station and has good service.

The rural free delivery service from East Norton was transferred to Mansfield, many miles away, and the carrier was dismissed.

The rural free delivery route from North Westport was changed and several patrons were deprived of the service.

The rural free delivery routes from Westport and South Westport were changed and many patrons had their service very seriously affected by delays in the transmission of the mails, which have been previously alluded to. If any new territory has been supplied which would offset the demoralization and overturning of these routes I am not advised. This enumeration only the more strongly emphasizes the necessity of competent examination and investigation by post-office inspectors before entering upon the campaign of destruction.

There is one other important feature in the bill now under consideration—H. R. 10484—to which I invite attention, beginning with line 10, page 14 of said bill, at the words "And provided further," and continuing on lines 11, 12, 13, and 14 on said page 14. There were a number of cases in different parts of the United States where the letter carriers had been employed to take letters from street letter boxes in cities and carry them to central post offices at certain specified hours, so that the letters could be sent on outgoing mails and thereby business could be greatly facilitated.

The Post Office Department determined that these letter carriers, who were generally of the highest grade and were regularly enrolled as carriers and were entitled, under the law, to $1,200 per annum, were not carriers but were collectors, and the compensation was reduced to $1,000 per annum. The law does not provide for collectors. But these carriers were reduced $200 each per annum and were informed that if they refused to accept this reduction of salary their services could be dispensed with. The work of carrying letters from street letter boxes to the post offices is as important as any other part of the Postal Service, and I am gratified that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have provided for correcting the injustice which a number of letter carriers have suffered by this arbitrary ruling of the Post Office Department.

There were 3 such carriers employed in the city where I reside and 42 were employed in Boston, Mass., of which I have knowledge, and doubtless many elsewhere, who will receive the compensation of which they were unlawfully deprived by the passage of this bill.

There are several bills now being considered by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads that, it is promised, will be reported from that committee, which, if they are passed by the Congress and are approved by the President, will more clearly define the status of the Rural Free Delivery Service and its employees.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, my good friend from Massachusetts never sees anything good in anybody or anything except himself and the Republican Party.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Oh, I have not mentioned the Republican Party.

Mr. MOON. I know the gentleman did not, and that is just what I am going to say. The gentleman was asked——

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. And I am ready to talk now——

Mr. MOON. I am not yielding now. The gentleman was asked a few minutes ago whether these carriers were Republicans, and the gentleman said he did not know, and he did not care about that. Now, in Massachusetts with three straight Republican administrations and everything made Republican in the way of carriers, it seems to me that the gentleman from Massachusetts ought to have known the political status of the carriers in his district, and if he does not know the facts in reference to the rural carriers better than he does the rural-delivery status, he does not know much about this matter——

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I will say to the gentleman that the district I represent, in the city of which I was mayor for six years, I never knew either Democrats or Republicans, but they all voted for me and they vote for me now. There was no division in——

Mr. MOON. Of course if they all voted for the gentleman we know what they are even if he does not know. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. They do not, and the gentleman will find that out in the next election.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman states that he made a complaint about the first rural route that was disturbed and that the department came along and fixed that one up just like it ought to be, as they wanted it; and the result of that was it disarranged every other route. The gentleman ought to wait until they get to it and fix up the balance, because the department does not want to disarrange any of the gentleman's routes or others and inconvenience the public. They want to arrange these routes for the convenience, as the letter of the department shows, of the Congressmen and the people, and——

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. They want to do it now, but they did not then.

Mr. MOON. They intended to do that and they have done it. The arrangement made in the gentleman's own district is up to the meeting of this Congress and shows the relative length of the route to be less than 5 miles between old routes and new in length. I asked the gentleman if he was not willing to concede or did not agree that where the Government could make a route 30 or 40 miles long and save the cost of a carrier and do as efficient and as good service to the public as heretofore, whether it ought not to be done there, and he was not willing to answer. I know there are places where this new service is put that it ought not to be put in and ought to be taken out, but it takes time to do that. Now, I am going to ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD——

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield just for one question?

Mr. MOON. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DOWELL. Do I understand you to say that these will be corrected?

Mr. MOON. I had read from the Clerk's desk a letter addressed to me by the department, from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, having this matter in charge, to the effect that as rapidly as possible it would be done in the immediate future, and that you would have not only one but two inspections, if necessary, to bring about the correction.

Mr. DOWELL. Is that to be all through the system where the changes have been made?

Mr. MOON. Every single place in the United States where there is a complaint.

Now, in order that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] may be correct, I will ask that the statement of the department showing the extension of rural routes ordered from March, 1913, to November 8, 1916, be included in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOON. I know we are going to have in a little while some complaints, probably, along the same line, because other gentlemen are laboring under the same trouble and want to have their routes adjusted. I think it is very well that we have the expression of some other persons connected with this matter, and I am going to ask, in view of the complaint that I know is coming from Indiana, to have a letter, written at La Fayette, Ind., and addressed to the Postmaster General, placed in the RECORD. I do not believe I will take the time to read it now. It shows that the service adjusted there has been entirely satisfactory, just as it was in the district of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAKES], and which is as we propose to do in all the districts.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee to print the letter referred to. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the letter referred to:

UNITED STATES POST OFFICE,
Lafayette, Ind., January 18, 1916.

HON. ALBERT S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

SIR: According to Representative WOOD, of this district, the motorization of rural routes is a failure. To substantiate his claim he refers to conditions in this county. He says he receives complaints every day from patrons on rural routes out of this office. I do not wish to cast any reflections upon the integrity of Representative WOOD. He is a splendid gentleman and a personal friend of mine, but I am afraid he has been imposed upon by designing individuals or people with chronic complaints. During my experience in the post office I have never found people with grievances at all backward about expressing them to the postmaster, and I can say with absolute truth that I am now receiving no more complaints from rural route patrons than I did under the old system of horse-drawn vehicles. There will always be complaints about the delivery of specific pieces of mail, whether on the rural routes or in the cities, partly because of improper addresses and partly because the infallible postal employee does not exist.

I was in this office two years before the motor routes were established and there never was a week, scarcely a day, that I did not receive some minor complaint about the delivery of mail in the rural districts. I still receive those complaints, but even with the increased length of the routes, I am certain I do not receive any more than I did before the more modern service was inaugurated. And for every man who complains to Representative WOOD about the failure of the present plan, I can produce at least one other who will commend it for no other reason than because of improved service accorded him.

There was some confusion when the motor routes were first established here last September, but the rough places were soon smoothed out and by October 1 deliveries were being made with regularity and precision. There were some people who had been passed by when the new routes were established, but when I was in Washington for the postmasters' convention I succeeded in having service restored to such and now the utmost satisfaction prevails in this community, except in some cases where patrons have been changed from the start of a route to the end of it, causing them to get their mail an hour or so later. But because of this same fact consider the pleasure of those who are receiving deliveries earlier than they formerly did. The two classes balance.

The two daily papers of this city are of different political faith from that of the present post-office administration, still not one word of criticism has appeared in the columns of either concerning the motor routes.

I am very sorry there has been such a mix up over the motor routes established in Wayne County, this State. The papers there are referring to the situation in this county and quoting Representative WOOD to show that the new system is a failure here. They are attempting to serve a partisan purpose, no doubt, and to do so they are not confining themselves strictly to the truth. I am not familiar with conditions in Wayne County, but I can see no reason why motor service should not be successful there after the confusion of the first few weeks has been straightened out, if the people interested refuse to be stampeded by selfish agitators.

Since December 24 we have had some very trying days upon which to attempt the delivery of mail in the rural districts. Deep snows, very slippery roads, very rough roads, and still 6 of our 11 carriers covered their entire routes without the help of an assistant, and the other 5 men divided their routes with helpers, and the delivery of the mail went on just as satisfactorily as it ever did under like conditions during the existence of the antiquated horse-drawn routes.

I sincerely hope you will not be swerved from your excellent course for the additional improvement of the rural service through the agency of motor routes by the present agitation in this State, and I am perfectly willing to have anyone investigate conditions in this county to determine whether or not your plan is a success.

Respectfully,

CHAS. H. BALL, Postmaster.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, also I will insert in the RECORD, with the consent of the committee, another letter, in view of the complaints coming from Georgia, because they are suffering from similar trouble. It is written from Barnesville, and shows the situation down there.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the letter referred to:

UNITED STATES POST OFFICE,
Barnesville, Ga., January 4, 1916.

FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Division of Rural Mails, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have read with much interest in the daily papers of the contest being made by the Georgia Congressmen over the extension of the present rural delivery system in this State. In some sections their contention may be right, but there are other sections in which this extension can be made with absolute satisfaction to all parties concerned, except the carrier who loses out by the change.

The Rural Free Delivery Carriers' Association are fighting the change with all their power, and seem to have gained the ears of the politicians and officeholders from this section.

I want to say to you in all candor that I have made no statement to your department with reference to the extension of these routes that I am not ready and anxious to prove to your satisfaction.

In order that the facts may speak for themselves I respectfully offer for your consideration the following suggestion: That you select any route out from this office as a demonstration route, name ——— as the carrier, and the mail will be delivered every day in an auto, when such service could be performed in a buggy. Mr. ——— owns an auto suitable for the business, and made the highest mark of any man who took the examination for auto rural carrier here on November 13, 1915, who lives in the delivery of this office. He is about 30 years of age and is an expert automobilist. I have no interest in ——— further than to demonstrate to your department that this service can be performed in a satisfactory manner, and he is the best man to do it.

The service from this office is in need of something, and I believe that a revision according to the department's plans is the very best that can be done. Our carrier No. 3 makes his trips in a Ford car, and has only used a buggy about four days since buying this car some time last spring.

Every energy at my command has been thrown into the running of this office and the improvement of the service, which, I think, will be proven to your satisfaction if you will take the trouble to look over my quarterly reports. The year 1915 shows a gain of more than $2,500 over 1914. I attribute this gain largely to the increase in parcel post, and I have been very active in building up this branch of the service.

I hope you will give my suggestion consideration, and that it will be received by you in the same spirit in which I make it.

Respectfully,

WILLIAM M. HOWARD,
Postmaster.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, in view of the fact that he caused to be read from the desk a letter from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General stating that as soon as the department could get around to it they would have one or two inspectors sent out into various districts where changes had been made, if he can give any reason why those inspectors were not sent into those various districts before the changes were made?

Mr. MOON. I can give you this, which, I think, is a very satisfactory reason for it: When these routes were established in the first place an inspector was sent to each route. A careful inspection of the whole territory to be covered was made. A diagram exactly indicating the location of the route and the surroundings was made. After the service went into effect another inspection was made, and those changes that were necessary for the convenience and the accommodation of the people were made there, in some instances at their solicitation and in some instances without it. So the department has to-day in the office at all times a complete map of the matter, and not only the map, but they have a file containing the facts and showing the exact situation.

Now, when these routes are to be changed they know the connection of every route, and in most instances it was altogether feasible from the map to lay out the new route; but in a great many instances they did send the inspector, and it must not be assumed here that in every instance the inspector did not go, because it is not true. We have not a great many inspectors—about 400 of them, I believe—with many thousand routes in this country. They were used as far as possible, but where these routes could be, in the opinion of the department, readjusted from the prints and the other information in the office it was done. It turns out, of course, that there are instances where a mistake was made. And that has to be and ought to be readjusted, because if it should appear that from the character of the roads they can not make the trip in the limit fixed, in an automobile, so as to make the saving, then the department, after that experience, of course, will have to abandon that part of the program there. But wherever it has been effectual or can be made use of it is to be done. That is a question of administration, and it is of a tedious administration. It needs careful consideration. And all of the facts necessary can not be obtained from the location by inspectors. There are other facts embodied in the consideration of this whole question that have to be considered.

Now, we may think that individually we know more about this than the men who are engaged in the administration, but my experience is that while we may know more about the legislation that ought to control these matters, in some instances we know mightly little about the administration, the executive duties, that obtain in these matters, and we are too prone to listen to every sort of complaint that comes to us from the people, whether it be from one party or another.

Now, the department can only say that which it has said. It is only fair that time and opportunity be given to effect necessary and proper changes. The department in making the changes, the overwhelming number of which are satisfactory, has done so for the benefit of the people and not to retain carriers or to discharge them. We ought to be better advised than to attempt to embarrass the department by such declarations as are made here.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for just a question?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the chairman of the committee admit that if there be routes existing now upon which changes have been made it will require the examination by one or more inspectors now, and which were not inspected before the changes were made, it would have been better to have sent those inspectors on the ground before the changes were made, in view of the fact that these routes were established many years ago, and with whatever systems of highways may have come into being since the establishment of those routes?

Mr. MOON. Of course; that goes without saying. The gentleman need not ask any such question as that. It is always best when anything is done that every possible fact be obtained in advance of its being done, but sometimes economy and sometimes the interest of the public requires an action that does not enable you to get completely every fact, and it may be better to establish the routes and then readjust them than to attempt to establish them upon all the facts in the beginning and not review them. A second consideration of a case is always best, however careful the first one may have been. Most of the routes readjusted are now satisfactory without the expense attending the inspection.

Now, my own judgment has been that it is always best to know everything that is possible to know before you take up a matter of that kind, but sometimes it is neither convenient nor expedient to do that. That, after all, is only a human affair. We are not dealing with men who are supposed to know more than ordinary human beings. An experimental proposition sometimes determines the best way to establish the final adjustment of a route; in fact, nearly always so.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. When is it reasonable to suppose that these inspectors will make their reports?

Mr. MOON. The letter of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General says "in the immediate future." The work is being done on them now.

Mr. HICKS. In six months, say?

Mr. MOON. Yes; I think in less than six months.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I rise this evening to answer in part the attack made by the distinguished Republican gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] upon the President of the United States and his policies, especially with reference to the preparedness of this country and the dangers that now confront the people.

There was a time when I did not believe that we needed to go into any unusual preparation. I believed in the proper strengthening of our Army and Navy and coast defenses, but I could not see the wisdom of the extensive program that was outlined by the administration.

The President of the United States a few days ago went over the western portion of this Republic and made speeches that contained statements which astounded me. I could hardly believe that the newspapers were correctly reporting him. I sent over to the Library of Congress and got copies of many newspapers and found that they all agreed as to what he said.

I am a member of the powerful Committee on Military Affairs of this House. We have been holding hearings ever since Congress reconvened, right after Christmas, and the hearings were just closed yesterday. We know what the Army officers and the experts of the War Department saw ahead and what they claimed to need. I analyzed what the President of this Nation said. I reached the conclusion that it is up to this Congress to stand by the administration and give him the power, and give the succeeding administrations the power, to have this country properly guarded, its integrity on the sea, the territory of this Republic, and all that goes with it.

It is hard for a man to change his opinion. But when an opinion is based on only a part of the facts, and when further hearings and evidence show new facts, a Congressman should act like a man on a jury—he should consider all of the facts and evidence. I am thus acting. I am a plain American, and I am naturally pugnacious and, I hope, courageous, and I must deal with truth and candor with both the House and my constituents. I owe it to both to give the reasons why my opinion has changed. [Applause.] But when I see that I had taken a stand based on only such knowledge as I and the country then had, but later, by the hearings in my committee, learn all the facts, which, in my judgment, require me to take a more advanced position, I am man enough to do my duty by my people and my country. [Applause.] I stand here as the spokesman and direct agent of 230,000 people in 10 counties of southwest Mississippi. They are as good, as patriotic, as brave and chivalrous as any other people on this globe. They have placed me here on the watchtower, and, seeing the danger that I am convinced this country is in, I owe it to them, I owe it to the head of this Nation, I owe it to my own self-respect, as a citizen and as a Congressman, to stand by the program at this time, indorsed by a Democratic President, which this Congress ought to pass, and which I believe it will pass.

First, I desire to say in my judgment the metropolitan press of this country has deceived the people. It has defamed our Navy and our coast defenses. They absolutely made the American people believe that we have no way to defend ourselves against the aggressions of other nations.

I feel it my duty to say what the records show we already have in the way of an Army, a Navy, and coast defenses. Gen. Nelson A. Miles testified before the Committee on Military Affairs the other day that we have, including the last 17 years, 400,000 men with a training of the Regular Army of this Nation; in addition to that another unit of 400,000 men trained in military arts and science from the agricultural or land-grant colleges of this Nation; in addition to that 400,000 men that have had the training of the National Guard soldiery in this Republic; and aside from that, I judge from other evidence before our committee, pupils of a great number of military schools in this Republic, from which we may estimate 300,000 men who have received military training.

We have, in addition to that, 315,000 trained men who were volunteers in the Spanish-American War. So that you see, gentlemen, there are at least 1,800,000 men in the American Republic under the age of 45 years who have had at least some degree of military training.

I submit herewith the present authorized strength of the Military Establishment, 103,647, and the table showing what the present view of the War Department is before our committee:

Strength as provided by revised draft of House bill to increase efficiency of the Military Establishment.		As now provided by law or Executive order.
Cavalry	20,670	The line of the Army, including Philippine Scouts, is limited by act of Feb. 2, 1901, to 100,000 enlisted men	100,000
Field Artillery	21,792
Coast Artillery	25,203
Infantry	57,900
Engineers	2,661
Porto Rico Regiment	1,930
Philippine Scouts	12,000
Recruits, etc. (5 per cent of Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery Corps, and Infantry)	6,278
Total	148,435
Cadet companies	3,210	No provision for such companies under existing law.
Ordnance Department	1,065	Ordnance Department	1,065
Signal Corps	2,698	Signal Corps	1,472
Indian Scouts	75	Indian Scouts	75
Quartermaster sergeants	403	Quartermaster sergeants	403
Military Academy detachment	632	Military Academy detachment	632
Total	156,518	Total	103,647

It would appear, therefore, that the bill referred to increases the Army about 53,000 men.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE, February 12, 1916.

That is a small Army compared with the population of this Republic. The War Department of this Republic in its revised program asks for 53,000 more. Surely 156,518 men as a total in the standing Army can not be regarded as a great standing Army, threatening militarism in a Nation of 100,000,000 people. The President in his revised view will be satisfied with several thousand less than the War Department desires.

As to the Navy, I will incorporate in my remarks the testimony of the admirals on that point.

As to our coast defenses, I will also incorporate the testimony of Gen. Weaver; and, by the way, he testified before the Committee on Military Affairs at this session that we have the best coast defenses in the world. Gen. Nelson A. Miles testified virtually to the same thing.

The Times-Picayune, a newspaper published in the city of New Orleans, which circulates in my district, stated more truth than usual in favor of the American Navy in criticizing me editorially when it admitted that Admiral Fletcher had said that the English Navy was the only one that this Republic could not successfully resist.

I wish to say further that this same paper admitted more truth than it ever did before about the coast defenses of this Republic when it admitted in part the evidence of Gen.

Weaver. That paper endeavored to distort what I said in my letter to my constituents, and what the true meaning is, by failing to say that Gen. Weaver predicated his statement that anyone could land upon the shores of this Republic upon the fact that the American Navy had been destroyed and was out of the way. Any fool knows that without a Navy soldiers could land anywhere where we did not have coast defenses. However, if our Navy is intact, as it is now, and our coast defenses as strong as they are now—the Navy holding the seas—every person knows no country could land soldiers on our shores. Our coast defenses can prevent them landing in the defended harbors even if we had no Navy.

Gentlemen, the American Navy, according to all the evidence, evidence which I believe, and which every student of the subject ought to believe, since the German Navy has lost six of its big vessels in the last 18 months, and many small ones and submarines, is second to none on the globe except Great Britain.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Excuse me, I can not yield.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I want to correct the gentleman's statement about how many vessels Germany has lost.

Mr. QUIN. I shall be glad to have the gentleman do that.

Mr. CALLAWAY. They have lost 84.

Mr. QUIN. I meant battleships and battle cruisers.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The gentleman had better revise that. They have lost armed cruisers, but not battleships and battle cruisers. Their battleships and battle cruisers are all backed up in the Kiel Canal.

Mr. QUIN. I thank the gentleman for his definite information. He is a member of the Naval Affairs Committee and knows whereof he speaks.

Then, if this Nation has the second Navy in the world, the newspapers of this Republic have fooled a great number of people. And as a further proof that we have the second Navy in the world, I will incorporate in my remarks a statement of the money that has been expended in the last 15 years by all the nations of the world upon their navies. Great Britain has spent more money than the United States, but the United States stands away ahead of Germany, Japan, Russia, France, Italy, or any other nation in its naval expenditures. If our Navy is not second, where has the money gone?

But if we are in danger, as the head of this Nation has said, do we not owe it to the people to add to and strengthen even our Navy? Do we not owe it to the American Nation to strengthen our coast defenses in a reasonable way? Do we not owe it to the American people to have some kind of citizen soldiery in this Republic? The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] wanted to know what had changed me from his way of thinking. I want to say to him that one of the things is that I have the utmost confidence in Woodrow Wilson as a man. I have the utmost faith in him as a gentleman and a patriot, and I have all the confidence in the world in him as a statesman and as the President of this great Republic. [Applause.] Furthermore, the testimony during the past several weeks—which is only finished a day or so ago—before the Military Affairs Committee by the Army experts and others shows the plain need of the reasonable strengthening of our defenses on land and sea.

I want to say that the head of this Nation, who is charged with all responsibility in dealing with foreign nations, states that he has information that has never been submitted to Congress. He states that he has information which leads him to know that this Nation right now is in danger and peril. In other words, he says things which warn us that we are sitting on an international volcano, and when he says that, I consider it my duty to take cognizance of such a statement coming from the President. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] said that I am hanging onto the coat tail of President Wilson. I wish to say to you, my good Republican friends, that is a mighty good coat tail to hang onto. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And when that coat wears out, we Democrats will get him another. [Applause.] And it is evident that our great President will wear out many coats before the American people will be willing to relieve him of the noble service he is rendering them during this period of international crises. [Loud applause.]

Another reason why I changed my mind and determined to stand by President Wilson in his preparedness policy is that when I see Republicans attacking him and his policies and some stabbing him in the back, I know it is time for me to get behind his coat and stand there ready to take a fall out of you and all other enemies of Democracy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. When did the gentleman's conversion, like unto that of Saul of Tarsus, occur?

Mr. QUIN. It occurred, as I have told you, after the President informed the country and us through his speeches of the great danger that we are in and after further hearings before our great committee demonstrated conclusively that the President is right. Much of the world is at war.

Understand me that I am not for the biggest Navy in the world, and the President is not advocating that. Let us be fair with him.

As I understand the President and as I think for myself, I am for a Navy sufficient to protect this country against any probable combination of adversaries who may, for one reason or another, at any time in the future, bring on war with this country. I believe in a good, strong Navy—it is our first line of defense. If we have a strong Navy no other nation will molest our citizens or their property on the high seas. This Nation has grown out of its swaddling clothes. Its prosperity depends very largely upon its foreign commerce. The surplus cotton of the South and the surplus cattle, corn, and wheat of the West must be shipped and sold abroad in order to produce a trade balance in favor of this country every year; otherwise the prices of these raw products will go down till our people are in poverty. The people of the South lost several hundred million dollars during 1914 because the outbreak of the European war ruined the price of cotton and its sale and shipment abroad, and right now, if we had a good enough merchant marine to carry promptly all our export cotton and enough good battleships to say to all the world, cotton is not contraband, and never was and never should be, therefore let our cotton alone, cotton would be 5 cents per pound higher than it now is. The cotton farmers of my district are as greatly interested in and will be as much benefited by a powerful Navy as the seacoast city people are, and more so.

And I want to discuss this continental army proposition that you speak of. President Wilson has been fair with the Military Affairs Committee. He has not for one moment endeavored to choke that committee and make it take a continental army nor anything else. I wish to say that the Military Affairs Committee have been listening all these days to all this talk from Secretary of War Garrison and the staff officers and Army officers and many others on down to its closing session yesterday.

Further answering the cynical inquiry a moment ago from the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] as to my change of attitude, I have had no change of attitude on the Army matter. I never did believe in a great standing Army, and I so said, and I stick to it. It is un-American, undemocratic. I took my political life in my hand for the sake of convictions in that matter, and I stated that if the President should stand for a big continental army I would even fight the President's idea favoring that, because it would burden the taxpayers, bring about militarism, and threaten the liberties of the people. I submit that it now appears I was right, for this day it is evident to all of us that the big continental-army plan that has been so much talked and written about is as "dead as a door-nail." I feel I helped to kill it. If the President ever favored it, he no longer does. You will see, before our Military Committee gets through, it will report a people's bill—one like I then and now advocated. So I have not changed so much as others have. The Secretary of War has resigned because we would not accept his big continental-army plan, and the President will agree on a compromise to use the National Guards of the several States as the basis of military preparedness. That continental-army plan was the first step toward compulsory military service in this country, and I am glad to hang crêpe on the door of its sepulcher.

We are going to strengthen the Army properly, and we are going to fix a citizen soldiery in this Republic that is going to be wise, judicious, and economical, both for the present and for the future. Who could object to such a democratic policy?

We should and will strengthen our coast defenses, wherever needed, so that our guns from our forts can shoot as far and as hard as any gun can shoot at our forts from an enemy ship.

I also think the Government should build, own, and operate a sufficient plant, or plants, to manufacture its war materials, so as to prevent private monopoly from overcharging the Government for whatever materials it may wish or need to buy. We are going to build a plant to make nitric acid out of air. It is the one thing that must be done. Powder and explosives can not be manufactured without this acid. We now get our supply from Chile. In war we might not have access to that source.

The nitric acid that goes into commercial fertilizers costs our farmers annually $77,000,000. That acid costs $225 a ton. The expert before our committee demonstrated we can make it out of air at a cost of $50 to $75 a ton. He certified $3,000,000 would erect plants to make all powder for the Government in time of peace; that $40,000,000 would erect plants for powder-manufacture purposes and for all the commercial fertilizers now used by the farmers in this Nation, and that at a saving to the Government and the farmers of 50 per cent. We would save the farmers $40,000,000 a year on the nitric acid that goes into the fertilizers they buy. Who of you would dare vote against this?

It is natural for me to pay the utmost respect to the views of the President; and if the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asked if my Saul of Tarsus conversion came about in that way I desire to say to him that I have stated what changed my opinion, and the Good Book says that "a wise man changes his mind but a fool never." [Laughter.] However, I wish to add, some of our ablest men can not change their minds, as well as millions of our intelligent citizens, in favor of preparedness. Every man has a right to his own opinion. When we set the sedge field afire the rabbits are going to run out, and when your Republican convention meets in Chicago and puts in its platform a plank indorsing what this Congress had done in respect to preparedness, the very things that we are going to do to defend the country against aggression, what are you going to do then? You are going to support it from then on, whether it is the doctrine of Woodrow Wilson or the ex-President to whom you referred; and I wish to say to the gentleman from Wyoming that another reason why I am going to stand by President Wilson is, that I believe the ex-President to whom he referred, Mr. Roosevelt, is going to be the nominee of the Republican Party. I feel that this country is safer in the hands of Mr. Wilson, who we know has done his utmost to keep us out of war. We know that he is a peace-loving man, we know that he does not have the jingo spirit and that he does not want to run down and invade Mexico. He does not want to run over and fly at the throat of some foreign country. That is one reason why I determined to stand by the man whom I believe and know the Democrats are going to nominate to bear the standard of our party, and if all of us Democrats will stand by him in this crucial hour, and help to hold up his hands, he will be in a position to win next November against your nominee, who may be a war man. There are several more reasons I could give you.

I believe that the money to pay for this "preparedness" can be raised in a way that will not hurt the poor people of this Republic. I am in favor and I believe that it is going to be done by this Congress, for there are enough men who are real patriots here who will vote for it, of making the wealth of this Republic pay for this extra expense that will be necessary to carry out this program—by income and inheritance taxes and other taxes on wealth.

There are men in this country we all know are making tremendous profits out of war contracts. I wish to say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY], if he will stand by us, we will get it out of the wealth, and through the income tax, and an inheritance tax, and perhaps a tax upon munitions of war. The Ways and Means Committee of this House should bring in a bill that will force wealth to pay the burden that preparation carries with it.

I will just say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] that the men who have changed from his way of thinking on this business never will change their ideas of raising the money. We are just as true to the men behind the plow and in the workshops of the country as before we changed. Every man in this House knows there has never been a piece of legislation here affecting the laboring man and the farmer when I have not been on the side of the laboring man and the farmer of this Republic fighting for their rights, and I am going to stay there as long as I am in Congress, and I am going to stay on the side of the farmer and the laboring people in this Republic as long as I am able to speak upon this earth.

And if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] is a true friend of the American people and the farmers and the laboring men, like I am, that is one of the reasons why he still clings to his ideals, but he is likely to wake up and find that he is mistaken in his views on preparedness. This Nation should be prepared to defend itself, and when the people know all the facts they are going to demand this of Congress. Although I know it will be as hard as pulling eyeteeth for that gentleman to change his set opinion, yet I am satisfied he will finally yield. I know it makes a man who has self-respect for himself struggle to bring about a change of views. It takes either a big man or a little one, whichever you are minded to call it, to change his opinions and convictions on such a serious matter as preparedness. [Applause.] The distinguished leader of the Republican Party, Mr. MANN, of Illinois, changed his views. I have respect for him as a man and a gentleman and a statesman, although he is a Republican. He stood as an economist against big navies and armament, and so on. He had sense enough to see the necessity of reasonable preparedness even before I did. [Applause and laughter.] He had sense enough to realize the dangers that are confronting this country. I admit that I could not see it until all the testimony was taken and the President told us of the great peril, and I do not blame the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY], but I still have hope for his conversion and at least that he will finally support the President. "While the lamp holds out to burn the vilest sinner may return."

I have very definite opinions as to where our future international danger lies, but as a Member of Congress of a neutral nation it is not proper to state those opinions; but from whatever quarter danger comes, self-interest and self-respect demand that this rich, free, proud Nation be in position to repel it.

I am following that man at the other end of the avenue, the President, who warns us of national danger and of our defense needs; and it is our duty to pay attention to him, and the American people believe him.

Do not you know if President Wilson were not honest and sincere in what he said in his recent speeches on his tour through the Middle West he would be the most despised man on the face of the earth; that he would be lashed by the cat-o'-nine-tails of his conscience through all his wakeful hours [applause]; that green-streaked scorpions would sting his soul in his hours of meditation, the furies of hell would torment him during his restless nocturnal repose? [Applause.] Do you not know a man who holds the responsible position of President of the United States would not for political ambition or self-aggrandizement go out to the American people and misrepresent the facts? Do not you know that he is honest and sincere in what he has stated? I know it, and I am going to stand by him and help to hold up his hands while he guides our ship of state through troubled and turbulent waters. If he were dishonest and did that for his personal ambition, Judas Iscariot, Alcibiades, and Benedict Arnold would be patriots and respectable gentlemen as compared to him. Do you not know this, if the President of this Republic, knowing how the American people would regard it, were to deceive them, they believing in his heart, in his soul, and intellectual integrity, in every statement that he made on the platform of this Republic, they would socially ostracise him and politically condemn him and personally curse him? He is the chosen representative of all the people. The President has kept us out of war, when a hot-head would have engulfed us in it. He has kept the interests of the Nation safe and its honor without a stain. In the presence of such character, learning, goodness, and wisdom party should hide its ugly head and faction should disappear, while the broad sentiments of pure Americanism should, and will, envelop him in its protecting arms. [Applause.]

Believing in the President's integrity as a citizen and as a President, and knowing that he fully realizes what the American people and the whole civilized world would think of him if he attempted deception, it is my duty to stand by him and help him fight his battles against those who are trying to down him. [Applause.] I am going to put the 230,000 people whom I have the honor to represent on the safe side. I am going to put them on the side of President Wilson. I am going to put them by my voice and my vote in this Congress on the side of what I believe is right in this great crisis. If I could not properly represent my people in a great emergency like this, I would feel ashamed. I wish to say, my friends, that, wrestling with my conscience and what my duty is on this question, after I heard the things that the President recited, after I read his utterances, and after having heard all the evidence before my committee, I reached the conclusion that it is my plain duty to stand by him. I have been honored with a great committee assignment at this great crisis. Now, the Committee on Military Affairs owes it to the American people to do the clean thing. It owes it to the farmer, the blacksmith, the shopman, the millionaire, and all to give them righteous and judicious legislation. You gentlemen know Chairman HAY. I wish to say I am willing to follow him anywhere. [Great applause.] He is a patriot. He is a statesman. He knows more about the military affairs of this Republic than any other single man in the Army or anywhere else. [Applause.] You need not be uneasy about the bill that our committee is going to report. It is going to correspond with what is right and just, and at the same time meet the approbation of President Wilson and the American people. It is going to be a bill that Republicans, Democrats, and Bull Moose all alike can support in a solid phalanx. [Applause.]

I further have confidence in the Committee on Fortifications. That committee is not going to ask this Congress to waste any money, and I do not believe that the Committee on Naval Affairs is going to do it either.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman yield me a little more time?

Mr. MOON. I will yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. QUIN. I thank the gentleman indeed for giving me additional time, and I wish to say on the question of who is to pay for this great expense, my friend from Texas agrees exactly with seven-eighths of the Democrats of this House. He agrees with me that wealth can be made to pay and not feel it at all. Why is it that we should, in this great crisis, not put the burden where it belongs? The United States Government, through special privileged legislation, has allowed great fortunes to be builded up in this Republic. If Mr. Rockefeller has millions a year as an income, why should he not be required to have 25 per cent, or more if necessary, taken in taxes for the national defense? Why should not a man who has an income of $5,000 a year pay something, and with a gradual increase up to the men who have $500,000 make them go into their jeans and pay into the American Treasury the necessary money to protect them against aggression or invasion. What millionaire is there in this Republic who would feel the effects of such an income tax? Upon the poor it would be a burden; but, my friends, if it is absolutely necessary, and you could not get it all out of wealth, it is our duty to make the preparation for the proper defense of this Republic, even if we have to place a part on labor.

The man behind the plow has confidence in his Congressman. I know the man behind the plow in my district has confidence in my judgment. I have confidence in him. I know he has confidence in my integrity, and while I have told him I have been against the program as at first outlined, he knows my heart and my sentiment, and being his spokesman here on the watchtower to look out for him, when I see the danger that this Republic is in, when I see the peril which the President has told us faces this great Nation, I know it is my duty to come out and say that preparation must be made, even if a part of its cost falls on the producing masses. But we can keep it from going there. We have it in our power and we are going to do it and put it on the people of this Nation who are able to bear it, upon the people who have the ability to pay it and not feel it. I never have believed in the outrageous Republican doctrine that we should get all the taxes out of the people who toil. I believe the American people know that there has been a system of legislation that has enabled great fortunes to pile up, and have fully realized that this great wealthy class ought to contribute more to the support of the Government. This Congress owes a higher duty, to see that if we put this burden upon the public we should lay it on those who are able to pay it and not feel that they have been taxed.

If the man who has $50,000,000 income has $10,000,000 taken out to put upon the national defense, how does he feel it? How does he suffer? They are the ones who have been clamoring the most for this national insurance. They are the people who have felt the danger the most. They are the people who proclaim loudest that this Nation should have the proper defenses to protect them and their property rights as well as the balance of the people and property in the Nation. Do you not think it is necessary to protect ourselves by an absolute guaranty that we know a national defense program will bring forth? [Applause.]

This free Republic has cost too much in blood and treasure in establishing its liberty, its principles, and its independence, and it means too much to the present and future generations of Americans, and it means too much as a beacon light extending its rays over the earth as a hope and encouragement to all mankind, to permit its glorious career to be checked by international war when it is not prepared for safe defense of its rights, its interests, and its safety, when all this can now be secured at relatively small cost. This Nation will never be the aggressor, I hope; but I want it to be organized industrially and in military, coast defense, and naval strength, so that if attacked it can acquit itself with honor and safety and thus pursue, under God's guidance, its grand career as the "land of the free and the home of the brave." [Loud continued applause.]

I herewith insert the following evidence, most of it taken last Congress, showing we have the second Navy and best coast defenses in the world:

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Now, according to the Navy Yearbook, Germany has battleships built, building, and authorized, 39. Would you say that if she could send all those ships against us, we would not be able to resist them?

Admiral FLETCHER. I should say that we ought to, if we have the greater force.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes; we ought to. Certainly we ought, and we could.

Admiral FLETCHER. Yes, sir; the greater force should win.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes; we could.

Admiral FLETCHER. I think so.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Now, it has been stated to us that if Germany were at war with us she could not afford, either, to send more than one-half her ships against us.

Admiral FLETCHER. That I do not know.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I am not asking you whether you do or do not. Assuming that she could send only half her 39, would you not say that we could successfully resist that number?

Admiral FLETCHER. Yes, sir; I would say so if all our force is available to meet her.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I would, too. Now, take France. This Navy Yearbook says that France has a grand total of battleships, built, building, and authorized, of 29—11 less than we have. Would you not say that if she sent all hers against us that we would be able successfully to resist them?

Admiral FLETCHER. Yes; our force available being the greater.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. And if she sent only one-half of them we would not have much of a fight, would we?

Admiral FLETCHER. No; we ought not to.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. That is the way I look at it. Here is Japan, which, according to the Navy Yearbook, has only 19 battleships, or 21 less than we have got. If Japan should send all of her 19 against us, do you not think we would be able successfully to resist them?

Admiral FLETCHER. Yes; I should say so, if all of our force were free to meet them at the time.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. And if she did not send but half of them there would not be much of a scrap would there?

Admiral FLETCHER. Probably not.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Now, here is Russia, that the Navy Yearbook says has a grand total of battleships, built, building, and authorized, of 15. If she should send all of them against us, would you not say that we could successfully resist them?

Admiral FLETCHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. And if she sent half of them there would not be any fight at all, would there?

Admiral FLETCHER. Not much.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Here is Italy, that has a grand total, according to the Navy Yearbook of 17 battleships. We could successfully resist them, whether she sent all of them or a part of them, could we not?

Admiral FLETCHER. Yes; I think so.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Now, Austria-Hungary, according to the Navy Yearbook, has a grand total of battleships, built, building, and authorized, of 10. We could successfully resist them, could we not?

Admiral FLETCHER. I think so.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Then what nation is there that we are not prepared successfully to resist? There is not one on earth, is there, Admiral—not a single one?

Admiral FLETCHER. Well, Judge, I think there is.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Well, which one? I have gone through the big ones. Tell me which one.

Admiral FLETCHER. I should say that England has a navy so much more powerful than that of any other nation in the world that she could easily keep control of the seas.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. England. Well, what other one, then?

Admiral FLETCHER. I do not think we need greatly fear any other single nation.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Then there is no other nation except England that, in your judgment, we could not successfully defend ourselves against?

Admiral FLETCHER. I think that is correct; yes.

Admiral FLETCHER. England has many ships which are very nearly of the same power of our own ships of same date of building.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Let us see about that, now. I do not believe she has, though you know more about it than I do. In this Navy Yearbook, which gives a list of the English battleships, I find that the last five dreadnaughts that England built or is building are named the Royal Sovereign, Royal Oak, Remiles, Revolution, and Revenge, each of which has a tonnage of 26,000.

Admiral FLETCHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. And we have two ships, the Pennsylvania and the No. 39, which have a tonnage of 31,400, and then we have authorized three more that are to have a tonnage, as I understand, of 31,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty-two thousand.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Thirty-two thousand tons. In other words, the tonnage of the Pennsylvania and No. 39 is 5,400 tons greater than that of the last five English dreadnaughts that are building, and the last three dreadnaughts that we are building have a tonnage of 6,000 tons greater than the last five English ships. Do you tell me that these English ships are equal to ours?

Admiral FLETCHER. No; I did not say that.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Do not you regard them as inferior to ours?

Admiral FLETCHER. Yes; as near as we can estimate.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I do, too. And the armament of these five ships is eight 15-inch guns, while the armament of the five American ships I have referred to is twelve 14-inch guns. Which is the more powerful armament, eight 15-inch guns or twelve 14-inch guns?

Admiral FLETCHER. I think the twelve 14-inch guns more powerful, but I am not sure this opinion is concurred in by all authorities.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Then, understanding your testimony, after reviewing it, do you want us to understand that England is the only nation on earth that has a navy that we could not successfully resist?

Admiral FLETCHER. I think that is the fair conclusion; yes, sir; at the present time.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Well, I wanted to get your views about that, because I do not like to hear Americans running around and talking about the German Navy being superior to ours. I know it is not so.

Admiral BADGER. You have not heard me say that.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. No; and I am glad that is so. I hope you never will say it, because there is not any truth in it.

Secretary DANIELS. I think when the war is over in Europe the countries are going to be so exhausted in their resources and are going to be so burdened with debt that there is going to be a great revulsion of feeling against war. I think there is going to be such exhaustion and reaction that the people are going to demand the cessation of this ever-increasing burdensome expense of war.

On page 572 appears the following report of the Secretary's testimony before the committee:

Secretary DANIELS. He [the President] absolutely refuses to lose his head merely because "some among us are nervous and excited." Even if the times are internationally out of joint, no occasion has arisen with us to plunge headlong into any frenzied policy or frantic action.

The new dangers which have arisen because of international complications have made the President realize the necessity for the program of national defense, and he changed his mind to meet these new dangers and conditions.

We have spent $200,000,000 on our coast defenses in recent years, and in a rigid examination, Gen. Weaver, Chief of Coast Defenses, testified in this hearing a year ago that our fortifications were ample and the most efficient in the world. In summing up his testimony Gen. Weaver says:

I have been a close student of the whole subject, naturally, for a number of years, and I know of no fortifications in the world, so far as my reading, observations, and knowledge goes, that compare favorably in efficiency with ours (p. 77, hearings before the Fortifications Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee).

Within the past few weeks Gen. Weaver has reiterated his testimony given a year ago.

Gen. Nelson A. Miles, in a statement the other day, testified to the strength and efficiency of our coast fortifications. He said:

Having had much to do with placing and construction of our fortifications and inspecting every one along the Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts, as well as having had an opportunity of seeing all the great armies of the world and many of their strongest fortifications, including the Dardanelles, I am prepared to say that our coasts are as well defended as the coasts of any country with the same class of high-power guns and heavy projectiles, and I have no sympathy for the misrepresentations that have been made in the effort to mislead the public. Our Nation is composed of sovereign citizens who appreciate their independence and realize the difference between their condition and that of the millions of men now mere subjects of some despotism and used as food for powder.

It has been said by the critics of our naval strength that our Navy lacks auxiliary vessels. Admiral Blue, Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, in his testimony a year ago said:

I believe I am correct in stating that we have now more auxiliary vessels in the Navy than any other nation maintains in times of peace (p. 40, hearings before House Naval Affairs Committee).

Another criticism of the Navy, which has appeared in all the eastern papers and many elsewhere, is that our Navy is deficient in submarine strength. Admiral Fletcher, commander of our fleet, testified before the House Naval Affairs Committee, and as to submarines he said:

I should think it would be reasonable precaution to provide a few more submarines, considering our extensive coast line in the Atlantic and in the Pacific. Yet I will say that compared to other nations, we are well provided with submarines to-day (p. 520).

In a further statement the admiral said:

I think a reasonable increase of submarines, 8 or 10, or something in that vicinity, would be a proper increase.

I would say in an emergency some vessels are ready to-day; some would be ready to-morrow; but I would say that all of them could be ready within a week (p. 561 of the hearings).

And finally, in this testimony which Admiral Fletcher gave before the committee a year ago, he said that—

England is the only nation on earth that has a navy we could not successfully resist.

In a report made recently, Admiral Fletcher tells us that our Navy is 15 per cent stronger now than it was a year ago, and that in accuracy of gunfire it has improved 30 per cent in the past year.

Testifying last year as to the progress of the Navy, Secretary Daniels said:

The Navy program has been upgrade all the time. The Navy is getting better every year. The present Congress gave three dreadnaughts and we have 7,000 more trained men in the Navy than a year ago (p. 597 of the hearings).

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND].

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I have been in this Congress since the day it opened, and only on one occasion before have I risen to my feet on this subject. I have noticed the speeches made on preparedness on both sides of the House; but with all the eloquence that has been expended here for the purpose of building up an Army and Navy, there has been no plan that would induce men to come forward and join. We must have prepared men if we want to be prepared.

Mr. Chairman, under date of January 10, 1916, I introduced House joint resolution 93, the purpose of which is to authorize the appointment of a commission in relation to educational, vocational, and military-naval training:

Resolved, etc., That a joint commission be constituted to be known as the joint commission on educational, vocational, and military-naval training, to be composed of three members of the Senate, to be appointed by the Vice President, and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker. The said joint commission be, and is hereby, directed, authorized, and empowered to examine, consider, and submit to Congress recommendations upon the following, to wit:

The need of educational, vocational, and military-naval training in the United States.

Whether national grants should be made to the various States to stimulate vocational and military-naval training, or whether schools or colleges should be established under the direct control of the United States and maintained entirely as national institutions.

If the said commission shall recommend that schools or colleges shall be established and maintained by the United States, then to recommend where not less than 20 such schools or colleges should be placed.

Whether a proportion of such schools should be established on the coasts for educational, vocational, and naval training exclusively.

To make recommendations as to the course of instruction in agricultural, trade, and industrial subjects as well as in military and naval training to be given in such schools and colleges, and to recommend the minimum age at which boys shall be admitted to such schools or colleges and the method of selecting the said pupils.

To make recommendations as to the total number of pupils to be received annually and to estimate the annual cost of the maintenance of such schools and colleges.

To make recommendations as to whether pupils who have been trained in such schools or colleges shall be subject to the call of the United States for military or naval services, as the case may be, and the number of years during which this condition of service shall prevail and whether such pupils shall during such period, when they are so subject to call for service, serve a limited time each year to perfect their military or naval training.

To make all other recommendations pertaining to the subject matter which aid in rendering more efficient a system under the control of the United States Government for educating boys while at the same time preparing them for military or naval service. To report as to whether such training shall be free of all cost to the said pupils and whether any monetary compensation shall be given the said pupils in the event of their being called for annual training after graduating from the said school or college.

The said commission shall report their finding to Congress on or before October 1, 1916, together with a bill embodying their recommendations and establishing such educational, vocational, and military-naval training schools or colleges. The sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated, the same to be immediately available out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray all necessary expenses of said joint commission, payment of said expenses to be made upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said joint commission, who shall be selected by the commission.

The investigations suggested in the resolution are for the purpose of submitting to Congress a bill involving a comprehensive plan to establish camps or barracks on land now owned or that may be purchased by the Government, and with suitable buildings thereon to conduct schools for vocational training, including agricultural pursuits, mechanical trades, erection of houses, and so forth; the manufacturing of arms, ammunitions, building of ships, and manufacturing or assembling of all parts thereto; in fact, teaching knowledge of all things and equipment that may enter into the art of modern warfare on or under land and sea.

When a plan for the establishment of such camps or barracks with schools for said purposes has been decided on, applications to enter such schools may be received from young men between the ages of 17 and 21 years to enter for a period of three years for vocational training, with such educational training as may be found necessary, together with such military training and naval training as may be necessary to fit and equip them for first-line war service against any foreign nation that may attempt to invade our shores or possessions or to destroy our rights, privileges, or commerce at sea. That such application may provide that the applicant may not be permitted to engage in case of war until he has attained the age of 18 years. Further, that after the matriculation period the applicant shall receive a certificate stating the different trades or vocations he was employed at during tuition and marks showing proficiency therein. The application may further provide that the applicant will for the period of four years after the matriculation period be available to and will hasten to the call of the United States Government wherever he may be should any foreign nation or nations attempt to invade our shores or possessions or destroy our rights, privileges, or commerce at sea.

This plan should provide for the payment of wages to the applicant during the period of education for the number of hours employed, at no less compensation than is paid for like service during apprenticeship in industries or pursuits of a like nature by private corporations; the Government, however, retaining such an amount from the compensation as may be equal to the cost of maintenance from each student.

It is not the intention that this plan should in any way interfere with the present Army, Navy, or State National Guards, unless it be provided that men who are now therein may be given voluntary opportunity, irrespective of age, to take the course of training offered by this plan.

Not less than 20 camps of this kind, which number has been suggested, should average each 5,000 students and 10,000 acres of land; more students and more acreage can be included on interior land camps than on camps near water, where shipbuilding can be carried on, they being for naval training.

After the initial cost of the land and perhaps some improvised building, the cost to the Government would be nil, as the munitions, arms, all upkeep, and equipment furnished by the students, tradesmen, and tutors would take the place of that otherwise purchased by the Government.

Personal experience warrants the declaration that the most serious problem for the average workingman, and in fact for the entire family, to solve is what shall the average boy or girl do in life after leaving school if, indeed, the privilege of remaining in school to 16 has been accorded them? The period provided in this plan is just the time of life when the boy has come to an age when his services will help in the upkeep of the family. He is eager and anxious to do something, the pulsing blood of his young manhood cries out for a chance to know how to do something to carry him through life, and he can offer nothing to him who employs but his young strength. Strong muscles alone are plenty and usually cheap. The trained hand and brain must accompany the strong back, else the chance of remunerative employment is small. The opportunity to learn a trade or a profession, a vocation, if you please, under this plan, would bring to the defense of this country in time of stress, great hordes of grateful, intelligent, trained, and patriotic citizen soldiers and sailors.

I do not wish to discourage attempts to increase our defenses, as I am personally for adequate preparedness in the best manner attainable, but additional men must be trained in time of peace to be effective.

On January 19, Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood, before the Senate Military Committee, expressed the belief that compulsory service should be resorted to. Oh, perish the thought of conscription in time of peace in America! Admiral Fletcher's report shows one division of the Navy alone on last June's review was short 1,350 men and officers. This, after we had feared we might be involved in war for nearly one year.

These are authorities.

But can we wonder at the nondesire of young men to enlist in times of peace, when the prospects are that at the end of the three or five year period of enlistment they will probably be less able to meet life's problems or to earn a living than when they went into enlistment?

That this plan would attract more men than could be accommodated to enter the Army and Navy can not be doubted when we remember that every private and semiprivate institution of vocational training of any note in this country is crowded, not alone with scholars but with applications; and the great agricultural colleges of each State can not take care of the demand or the demands for place in their own confines. The needs of our country are apparent to all, and as we must be prepared, then, for the sake of humanity, for the sake of efficiency and the men we must and do always depend on to go to the rescue of the country—the poor boy, the sons of the farmer, the sons of the men in the mills, mines, factories, and of those engaged on our transportation lines; for the sake of the younger brothers of the soldiers and sailors now in the service, all of whom will go to make up the Army and the Navy. Give them a chance to live as other men live when not engaged in protecting us from foreign world powers.

That a wondrous lesson is at this moment being taught in the present European war of the advantage of vocational training and soldiering combined over soldiering alone, can not be denied, but at this time I will not go further in that, but data, proof, and reason are at hand to further support the whole idea suggested and will be given before the committee when opportunity occurs, and will in any event be placed in the RECORD at a future time if permitted. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KETTNER].

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Chairman, there have been several bills introduced at this session of Congress with a view to creating a tariff commission. As a director of the Chamber of Commerce of the City of San Diego for a number of years, I have continuously advocated a nonpartisan tariff commission. I was very glad, indeed, when I saw that some of my colleagues from California had introduced bills along this line; then that the gentleman from Illinois, the distinguished Republican leader, Mr. MANN, had introduced one; and when later on the gentleman who is now in the chair, a member of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. RAINEY, introduced a similar bill, I reached the conclusion that we shall have a tariff commission before this Congress adjourns. In that connection I should like to have the Clerk read a letter I have received from the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America along these lines.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the communication.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., February 4, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM KETTNER,
National Councilor, Chamber of Commerce, San Diego, Cal.

DEAR SIR: In view of the general public interest at this time in the question of a permanent tariff commission, we feel that as national councilor for the San Diego Chamber of Commerce you should be fully informed regarding the activities of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States in advocating the establishment of such a commission.

At the first annual meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, January 21–23, 1913, a resolution was adopted in favor of the establishment of a permanent tariff commission, and was referred to the board of directors for submission in referendum form to the constituent members of the chamber in order to ascertain their views.

The proposition was submitted to the organization members on April 30, 1913, in the following form:

ORGANIZATION OF COMMISSION.

First. That the appointment of the commission, following the usual procedure, be vested in the President with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Second. That in order to make the commission an effective administrative body the number of commissioners should be limited, preferably not more than five.

Third. That the term of office of members of the commission should be sufficiently long to give the board stability and permanency, preferably six years, and the terms of members should expire in rotation as in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Fourth. That a provision should be made for minority representation as in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission, where not more than three of the five members shall be of one party.

POWERS OF COMMISSION.

First. To gather, investigate, and tabulate technical and statistical facts of all kinds pertinent to the tariff schedules, both in this and other countries.

Second. The reports of the commission should be confined to ascertained facts and should exclude recommendations unless called for by the body having power to institute tariff legislation. The information secured by the commission should be available to either House of Congress and to the President.

The result of the referendum was 715 votes in favor of a commission to 9 opposed. The aggregate membership of the organizations that voted affirmatively was approximately 114,000. The national chamber has ever since actively urged the creation of a commission.

In February, 1915, the delegates to the third annual meeting unanimously reaffirmed the position of the national chamber as determined in the referendum of 1913. It may fairly be assumed that the 600 delegates at this meeting indirectly represented dominant opinion among the 279,000 business men comprising the membership of the 624 federated commercial organizations.

From the time when the membership of the national chamber first indicated through the referendum its unmistakable attitude, the board of directors has sought in every proper and appropriate way to advance the idea of a permanent tariff commission. The present committee, which directs the efforts of the national chamber in this direction, was appointed by authority of the board of directors in the summer of 1915. That the original attitude of the membership of the national chamber as expressed by the votes cast in the referendum and as reiterated at successive annual meetings in fact persists, is clearly manifested by the fact that about 200 of the organizations in the membership of the national chamber have appointed committees of their own to advance the cause of a tariff commission. These local committees have joined with the committee of the national chamber in presenting the arguments which support the proposal that a commission should be created.

When the pamphlet which states these arguments was sent to the Members of Congress, the acknowledgments indicated keen interest and a ready disposition to give careful consideration.

Very truly, yours,

ELLIOT F. GOODWIN, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I only want to ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, in order to insert certain letters and communications with regard to certain automobile routes, and to pay my special respect to this system, under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I have studied section 17 of the Post Office appropriation bill with some care in order to try to find out whether it is fair to the small railroads, the trolley roads, and the ferryboats that carry the mail. They are not well treated under present arrangements, and I can not quite make out whether this bill gives them any better treatment or not. There has been in a great many places a taking away of the mail from those small lines, to the great inconvenience of a good many people. We used to hear complaints about the way freight was routed by railroads, sending it over long lines instead of sending it over short lines. Now, I happen to know of a case where the United States Government sends mail 150 miles to get it 3 miles, and connecting those 3 miles are trolley roads and ferryboats, and also a railroad going across a bridge. Instead of using any of those routes the United States Government sends this mail from Poughkeepsie, which is my home city, on the Hudson River, to Albany, 75 miles. It is sorted there, and comes down on the West Shore Railroad to Highland and the town of Lloyd, a town of about 2,800 people, opposite Poughkeepsie. Connecting Highland with the town and village of New Paltz, a village of about 1,200 people, is a trolley road, and that trolley road runs from the ferry. The distance from the ferry landing to the village of Highland is a little more than a mile and to New Paltz 9 miles.

There is a trolley, of course, in the city of Poughkeepsie, running down to the ferry, so that there is a complete connection either way. The screen-wagon man from the Poughkeepsie post office, going to the New York Central Railroad station, also goes within 1,000 yards of the ferry. There used to be a mail service by way of the ferry and the New Platz trolley railroad. It has been taken off. Now, as I say, it takes 150 miles to go those 3 miles. The result is that mail deposited in the Poughkeepsie post office, a city of 32,000 inhabitants, after the shopping time in the afternoon, can not get these 3 miles in time to go out by the rural delivery routes the next morning.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. STEENERSON. Has the gentleman called the attention of the officials of the Post Office Department to this matter?

Mr. PLATT. I have. It comes under the Second Assistant Postmaster General's department, under the Division of Miscellaneous Transportation.

Mr. STEENERSON. What excuse did they give for that situation?

Mr. PLATT. I can not make it out, quite; but they have promised to investigate it, and they have been over it several times. As nearly as I can make out, it is partly red tape and partly a tendency to do business only with the trunk lines, the big railroads, and partly bureaucratic inertia that holds the matter up. The mail used to be taken down to the river and put on the ferry, which crosses the river every half hour. Sometimes the trolley on the west side, which runs only every hour, was not there at the moment the mail was taken over, and then they would throw the mail sacks off on one side to wait for the trolley to come along. There were doubtless sometimes a few minutes when the mail sacks were unguarded. I have heard that given as a reason for the discontinuance of the ferry service, but other ferry services on the Hudson were discontinued at the same time, and I am of the opinion that the real reason was the tendency to deal with the big railroads, routing mail very much as package freight is routed by the railroads to a central sorting point. If the ferry route is not considered entirely satisfactory the mail could be sent all rail across the Poughkeepsie Bridge.

Mr. STEENERSON. Has the gentleman had any conversation with the Superintendent of the Mails about it?

Mr. PLATT. I have had conversations with the division superintendent, and have thought at times that I was making some progress, but nothing has been done to restore the service yet.

Mr. STEENERSON. It seems to me it involves a great waste of public money.

Mr. PLATT. Probably it does. At the time the ferry service was discontinued there was not a great deal of mail to cross the river, but since the parcel post was put in there has been a good deal of increase in the mail, and there always was as much mail as goes out on an ordinary rural delivery route, and probably more. Besides that, the villages on the west side of the river, as well as the city of Poughkeepsie, have grown. It is time, in my judgment, that that very curious situation should be remedied, as complaints are becoming more and more frequent.

Mr. STEENERSON. Has the gentleman any suggestion for legislation or is that an administrative matter purely?

Mr. PLATT. No; I have no present suggestion to make. I have only made complaint as others have done. Possibly I may find some place for a suggestion as to legislation when we come to the discussion of this bill under the five-minute rule. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] yields back five minutes.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a communication addressed to me by the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce concerning neutral rights on the high seas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the communication referred to:

SAN FRANCISCO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
February 4, 1916.

Hon. J. A. ELSTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, representing the business interests of the community of San Francisco, has for some time viewed with considerable apprehension the interference with American neutral trade on the seas by the British Government. Silence on this subject has not indicated acquiescence in the moral or legal justice of the course of the British Government, but has thus far been dictated by a desire to be of as little embarrassment to the Federal administration as possible in handling the delicate situation with which it is confronted.

The propriety of this communication has been suggested by the thought that further silence on the part of an organization representing the business interests of the community of San Francisco might prove misleading as to the popular sentiments entertained here.

We fully recognize, and we trust justly appreciate that the rights of neutrals during the course of any war must be nicely adjusted with regard to the rights of belligerents; but appreciating that under the principles of international law belligerents may have rights more or less clearly defined, we also recognize that under those same principles neutrals likewise have certain clear rights, and among them is the right of neutral trading under appropriate conditions.

There seems to be little opportunity for differences of opinion as to what really constitutes absolute contraband of war concerning which a neutral can insist upon no right that his trade should be protected. The difficulty appears to arise with reference to those commodities designated as conditional contraband of war, and those articles which may be classed as conditional contraband of war appear to become extended with more reference to the necessities of the belligerents than with regard to the rights of neutrals.

We are not disposed to quarrel with any rights which belligerents may assert as the result of an actual blockade, but we believe that our Government can with dignity and propriety protest against any claim on the part of any belligerent to enjoy the same rights from a paper blockade which might be justly claimed in the case of an actual blockade. Upon like reasoning we protest against the extension of the doctrine of continuous voyage asserted by the British Government, which, we are advised, goes further than any doctrine of continuous voyage ever asserted by our Government or maintained by our courts. And in this connection we call attention to an instructive and interesting article in 29 Harvard Law Review, pages 195 and following (Dec., 1915).

We also protest against any arbitrary declaration that foodstuffs should be deemed absolute contraband of war. In this connection we would call particular attention to the effect of such efforts upon one of California's main industries, the fruit industry, which has suffered and is suffering seriously from the interference by belligerents with the marketing of those products and is and has been entailing enormous financial loss to the producers of this State.

While we do not think it would be becoming for us to suggest a method by which these protests could be made effective by the administration if they be deemed proper as in the delicate position in which the United States of America find themselves placed by this great war it would appear to be the part of patriotism to allow our problems to be solved by our constituted authorities, we nevertheless desire it to be known that we would approve any action by the administration which sought to make its protests along the lines suggested effective by even prohibiting the exportation of arms or munitions of war on the part of all persons in the United States, or the further subscribing to war loans of the belligerents by any person in the United States.

Very respectfully,

SAN FRANCISCO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
S. B. MCNEAR, Vice President.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman wait for just a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert my remarks in the RECORD on the occasion of the birthday of Abraham Lincoln, and referring to some of the men who served under him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD touching Abraham Lincoln. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I would like also to have the privilege of extending my remarks and making some observations on the natal day of President Lincoln.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Lincoln's birthday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I have listened with much interest this afternoon to the explanation that has been made of the Post Office appropriation bill, now under consideration, and I have been very much gratified to learn the acknowledgment made by the chairman, Mr. MOON, that the changes heretofore made of the rural routes were not proper; and that the committee has reported an extra increase in the appropriation beyond that which was asked for by the Post Office Department of $4,500,000 for the purpose of again readjusting this highly appreciated service and correcting the mistakes made. The report shows that there are 43,800 rural routes in the United States; that a total appropriation of $316,364,879 for the Postal Service for the fiscal year 1917 is asked for, as against $313,364,667 for the last appropriation; that the sum asked by the department to carry on the rural service is $48,500,000, but that the committee has asked that this amount be increased to $53,000,000. I hope the amount asked for by the committee will be allowed and the extra amount will permit the rural routes to be again restored to those deprived of them.

I have received a great many complaints, but it would do no good for me to go into a history of them. In fact, I could not in the very brief time allotted to me. But I will say that when the changes were made they were made up without the knowledge of anyone that the routes were to be changed. No one was consulted and, as one speaker said a few minutes ago, "made by some clerk here in Washington and from charts here." The character of the road has much to do with the mail carrier and changes when made should consider the highways as well. But with the assurance from the chairman of the committee that they are to be readjusted, I trust that all those who have had this service for a number of years, with the mail carried to their doors, will be put back upon their routes and have the same service which they have heretofore had; because I consider that where the mail has been delivered for a number of years, in some cases as high as 15 to 30 years, a mail box becomes as much an attachment and as much an appurtenance to a place as if it were a building, and it certainly is a great convenience.

I have also listened with a great deal of interest this afternoon to the discussion upon preparedness and national defense, and while I have been listening I have thought of the communications which I am receiving every day. Nearly every one of the speakers presents a different idea and a different theory. I hope the time will never come, but if it does and our soldiers are called to the colors to defend our country, that they will not have to fight in the trenches with crowbars, as it is reported the Russians did at Pryzemel. I hope that one rank will never have to stand behind another, waiting until the foremost man falls in order to be furnished with a rifle with which to defend his country, and that we will have more ammunition than will last our Army and Navy two hours in action. [Applause.] I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that all of preparedness consists in a large standing army and a great number of men. I believe that if the history of the European war has taught anything, it has taught the fact that they can enroll men a great deal more quickly than they can equip them. For that reason it seems to me that some of the gentlemen who are talking of and looking only to a large Army and a large number of men ought to see to it that we have ample equipment for them. We are the inventors of the aeroplane. Is it possible that we have only 20 that are fit for service to-day? We are the inventors of the submarine. Is it possible that we had only 1 out of 29 that could dive in the naval evolutions at Norfolk last year? I believe in reasonable preparation and equipment for the Army and Navy; then when danger comes we will have something to do with. [Applause.]

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

But, Mr. Chairman, it was my purpose in arising to speak briefly, of our beloved martyred President, Abraham Lincoln, compatriot of Washington; the one the father and the other the savior of his country. The spirit of the present times brings their memory strongly in the light of to-day. Illustrious in arms, both unfaltering patriots and peerless statesmen, but, over and above all, they were true Americans. Each piloted his country through a storm which lasted through dreary years and left us a heritage for which they pledged their lives; and to-day we are brought to a realization, as never before, of the legacy and inheritance bequeathed to us and to our children. Each was at once the right one to guide the destiny of the Nation. Each left the structure of our liberty and the foundations of our institutions more secure and more firmly established. Being 7 years of age when the bugle sounded for the conflict, it was not my privilege to have ever seen the supreme Lincoln, but the esteem and love in which the brave boys who fought the great battles of that momentous war hold him leave no shadow on his greatness. They hold his every act in greatest reverence and admiration and cherish it as a priceless boon to have been in his presence. His acts were all founded on high principles of religion and statesmanship, and yet he loved most of all to be styled one of the plain people. He was most forgiving, gentle, and tender-hearted. He builded his future greatness upon the great truth uttered centuries before, that "a house divided among itself can not stand." He started in life in the frontier. He was captain of a company in the Black Hawk War in 1832, at the age of 23, and began a military career. He was postmaster of his home town of Salem. He served for four terms as member of the State legislature; he served one term as a Member of Congress, from 1837 to 1839; and during all these years, it is stated, he devoted himself assiduously to the study of books of learning. He was most familiar with the Bible, and his afterlife showed him to be well educated. He was proud of being termed one of the common people. In one of his speeches in Ohio, in 1859, it is recorded of him that he stated, "I am most happy that the plain people understand and appreciate this." Time does not permit me to even allude to many of his wise sayings, but allow me to quote these few:

A private soldier has as much right to justice as a major general—

And they sang, "We are coming, Father Abraham, 300,000 strong."

I believe this Government can not endure permanently half slave and half free.

I do not expect the house to fall, but I do expect it will cease to be divided. It will become all one thing or all the other.

What constitutes the bulwark of our liberty and independence? It is not our frowning battlements, our blustering seacoasts, our Army and our Navy; these are not our reliance against tyranny. Our reliance is the love of liberty which God has planted in us.

He fought to save the Union. He lived to see the war ended, but passed away just as the sun's rays were shedding their golden hues over a united country—a Union saved. And with the ages will his life and memory be a light to guide our destiny. He was born February 12, 1809, and died a martyr April 15, 1865, mourned by the world.

"His tongue is mute; his heart may pulse no more;
Yet men so good and loved do never die;
But while the tide shall flow upon the shore
Of time to come, a presence to the eye
Of nations shall he be, and evermore
Shall freemen treasure in historic page
This martyr-hero of earth's noblest page."

[Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman desire to go on?

Mr. MANN. Oh, it is Saturday night.

Mr. MOON. Very well; I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAINEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the Post Office appropriation bill, H. R. 10484, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. KEARNS for 10 days, on account of business of the House.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 14, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee day by day because we desire to live out our lives in the spirit of prayer. We recognize the higher power. We recognize the Great Spirit above us from which our life has come. We seek no higher good than the good that Thou dost give, for Thou art the author and giver of every good and perfect gift. Our ideals are inspired in us by Thy spirit, and the highest benefit that we can have in life is the benefit of Thy grace upon our hearts. Look upon us today in the love and tenderness of a father, and guide us in the discharge of the duties of the day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last were read and approved.

DEVILS LAKE, N. DAK., February 5, 1916.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: A few years ago the Congress of the United States financed the undertaking of having a reunion of the surviving Union and Confederate soldiers of the Civil War at the historic battlefield of Gettysburg. Since that time thousands of those old men have passed from the scene of action and have passed on to the great beyond. That was their last reunion on this earth. I know that you lent your influence and your vote to promote that meeting and I am sure you do not regret having done so.

There are a few of us left yet, and we are desirous, especially those who were engaged in the siege, of having a similar meeting at Vicksburg financed by Congress as before.

I hope therefore that the present Congress will recognize the precedent made for the Gettysburg reunion and that you will exercise your great influence in behalf of the Vicksburg gathering.

Believing that I know what your answer will be, I beg leave to thank you in advance for your help and consideration.

Yours, truly,
D. G. DUELL.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have received a telegram from Adrian, Mich., containing resolutions adopted at a meeting of citizens of that city, which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD.

ADRIAN, MICH., February 12, 1916.

The COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
The Senate, Washington, D. C.:

At a meeting of 30 manufacturers, bankers, and professional men held at the public library in the city of Adrian, Mich., February 11, 1916, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted and the undersigned committee authorized to transmit them to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Michigan:

"Whereas it is the sense of this meeting that the question of the national defense is not only the paramount issue at this time, but overwhelmingly transcends any and all other issues and policies: Therefore

"Resolved, That we approve the plan of national defense as recommended by the administration, including the plan of a continental army, and that we deem it imperatively necessary that Congress support it as the only concrete plan definitely proposed or available for action.

"Resolved, That if any change be made in said plan, such change should be in the direction of making it stronger, more efficient, and more quickly available, and by no means in a contrary direction.

"Resolved, That the National Guard ought to be improved, relieved from strike duties, and more completely federalized, but that under no circumstances should it be made to take the place of the proposed continental army.

"Resolved, That we regard the existing situation as distinctly in the nature of an emergency and that we deprecate any unnecessary delay in dealing with it on lines of utmost efficiency and the broadest patriotism.

"Resolved, That particularly do we regard as indispensably necessary a great and immediate increase in the Navy, and to that end we urge the completion with all possible dispatch of all vessels now under construction or authorized, and that such new increases as may be authorized should be carried out as quickly as possible and not spread over a series of years."

To the Hon. Senator BLAIR LEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: We, voters and taxpayers of Oxon Hill district, Prince Georges County, Md., have the honor to petition the United States Senate, through you, as follows:

The National Guard of the District of Columbia have a target range near Congress Heights, D. C., adjoining Maryland, and, as there is great carelessness, bullets have often gone astray—so much so that men employed at farm labor have refused to work in the fields while practice was in progress. In one instance a bullet penetrated the home of Mr. William H. Moore and lodged in a bed. We have made repeated efforts to have practice in so dangerous a place abolished, but without avail. There seems to be no law whereby we can compel them to discontinue practice or collect damages resulting from stray bullets; therefore we ask the United States Senate and the House of Representatives that practice be discontinued until some way is found to hold the National Guard of the District of Columbia, as an organization, or its officers, responsible for all damages, pecuniary or otherwise.

We, the undersigned, all live within the danger zone of said rifle range.

ADDRESS BY HON. WALTER L. FISHER (S. DOC. NO. 323).

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document an address delivered by ex-Secretary of the Interior, Walter L. Fisher, delivered on January 27, 1916, before the Industrial Club, of Chicago, entitled "Preparations for Peace."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

ADDRESS BY HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, on the 22d of January my colleague [Mr. LODGE] delivered an address on the question of national defense which I asked should be made a Senate document. This was done, and the number printed was exhausted in two or three days. There is a very considerable demand for the document, and I ask unanimous consent that 1,000 copies be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The order was reduced to writing and agreed to as follows:

Ordered, That 1,000 copies of Senate Document No. 263, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, entitled "National Defense, a speech delivered before the National Security League on January 22, 1916, at Washington, D. C., by Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE, United States Senator from Massachusetts," be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. OLIVER was, at his own request, relieved from further service on the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

On motion of Mr. LODGE it was Ordered, That the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] be appointed to fill the vacancy on the Committee on Interstate Commerce caused by the resignation of the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER].

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT (S. DOC. NO. 322).

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document, in parallel columns, a comparative print of House bill 408, to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes, showing the bill as passed by the House, the bill as amended by the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate and reported to this body, and in a third column Senate bill 3331 as reported by the Senate Committee on Commerce. These bills, Mr. President, relate to water power, the one coming from the Committee on Public Lands applying to water-power development in connection with the public lands, and the other coming from the Committee on Commerce applying to water-power development in connection with navigable streams. The Public Lands Committee of the Senate has reported House bill 408 by striking it all out and inserting a new bill, and I think it would be of interest in the consideration of these bills to have them in parallel columns. In a great many respects there are portions dealing with the same general nature and character of legislation, whether they relate to water-power development in connection with public lands or in connection with navigable streams. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the three bills which I have indicated be printed in bill form in three parallel columns.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROPOSED CENTRAL POWER PLANT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. OLIVER. Out of order I ask to have read a telegram which I have just received concerning the location of the power plant. It is a short telegram.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

ARTHUR A. HAMMERSCHLAG.

Mr. THOMAS. I am in receipt of a similar telegram, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO., February 11, 1916.

Senator CHARLES S. THOMAS,
Washington, D. C.:

THOMAS MACLAREN,
President Colorado Chapter American Institute of Architects.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in this connection the Washington Architectural Club, which is located in the District of Columbia, has written me a letter which I should like to have read into the RECORD.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to state in connection with the reading of the letter that the Washington Architectural Club is composed in the main of employees of the Supervising Architect's Office.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think my request might be complied with, and then if the Senator wants to discuss it afterwards he may do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read.

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Washington Architectural Club has followed with deep interest the public discussion concerning the location of the proposed power plant for the Government buildings.

The board of governors have unanimously concluded, after a careful investigation into the facts of the case, that from the standpoint of practicability and architectural treatment the present site is in a satisfactory locality for the following reasons:

That, even though the building will be in close proximity to a feature of the development plan of the city, it will be on ground which is part of the reservation for commercial buildings in the development scheme. This ground being on the river front is of low elevation and tends to reduce the apparent height of the building and stacks, and therefore when future buildings of the development scheme are complete the entire plant, it seems, will be greatly obscured.

Furthermore, considering the proposed beautification of the commercial reservation, it appears that a power house well treated architectuarlly would be an aid to the desired result rather than a detriment; and, again, it seems preferable to have a building which can be enhanced by a certain amount of landscape architecture and which would be a point of interest to the public in the forefront of this reservation rather than a fish wharf or similar water-front building which exhibits its commercial use undisguised. Certainly a well-equipped power plant with highly developed machinery generating enormous power is always an attraction to the public as well as an educational feature.

Furthermore the alternate suggestion is the Capitol power plant; but this is subject to the following objections: It is only two blocks from the beautiful House Office Building, while the proposed plant is about three blocks from the new Bureau of Engraving and Printing and about four blocks from the proposed memorial to the founders of the Nation. These are the features of the development scheme which are nearest to the new site. Also, the ground level of the Capitol power plant is about 30 or 40 feet higher than that of the new building, which would cause the stacks to project into the sky line in a more conspicuous manner than the proposed scheme.

Concerning the question of the architectural appearance of the stacks, it does not appear that this is an insurmountable problem. The general ethical, as well as public conception of a power plant, includes, as a matter of course, suitable stacks or chimneys. This is a problem which is being studied by engineers and architects all over the country nearly every day and with a high degree of success, and it is believed that in this case it can be successfully solved.

In view of the general misunderstanding among the public concerning the above facts as evidenced by the articles appearing in the newspapers, the board of governors of the Washington Architectural Club feel it a duty to forward copies of this letter to the responsible Members of Congress, to the Secretary of the Treasury, as well as to the architectural clubs throughout the country which are affiliated with this organization.

Respectfully submitted.

WASHINGTON ARCHITECTURAL CLUB,
DANIEL J. LIX, President.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, lest my former statement may not have been heard as the result of interruption, I wish to say that this architectural club, I am informed, has very few practicing architects in its organization but that the majority of the members of that club consist of employees and draftsmen in the Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, which is backing the erection of the power plant at this site. That is my information, and I propose to present proof of it later on in a letter from one of the members of the organization.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. In this connection I wish to state, if the Senator will permit me, that I desire to offer and have printed in the RECORD a letter from Hennen Jennings, vice president of the American Federation of Art and vice president of the Washington Federation of Arts, a consulting engineer, regarding this matter. I will not ask that it be read at present.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Have it read.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well I will ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BRYAN. I suggest to the Senator, would it not be better to have the letter read when we are considering this subject on the conference report? I understand the subject is not under debate at this time. What is the use of reading it now?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I asked that it be read at the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], but I think the suggestion of the Senator from Florida is a wise one, and I shall not ask that it be read now but that it be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

FEBRUARY 13, 1916.

Hon. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS,
Senate Committee on the Library, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Since writing to you on the 5th I have given further study and obtained new information pertinent to the relative merits of enlarging the present Capitol power plant, and now send for your consideration the following:

In visiting the location for a central heating, lighting, and power plant at the foot of Fourteenth Street one is immediately impressed by the present squalor of the surroundings and the seeming appropriateness of the site; but a drive in Potomac Park and on the island and a close study of plans and imagination as to the future aspect of this station will soon convince you to the contrary. The shacks, ugly lumber piles, etc., that now exist can be easily removed and the ground cheaply acquired when the Government at some future date desires it. The misfortune is apparent when you consult the maps and plans of the park commission, and also the plans and models of Col. Harts for elaborating the extension and beautification of Island Park. In examining these plans and models you will find the major axis of the Mall runs from the Capitol, through the Washington Monument, to the Lincoln Memorial, east and west, and that the minor axis runs from the White House, through the Monument Garden, north and south, and within 1,800 feet of the proposed power station. You will notice also that there is provision on the plan for a site for the memorial to the founders of our country, part of which would be within less than 1,000 feet of the proposed power station. The power plant, unsightly from the start by reason of its 180-foot smokestacks and the excessive height of the building, from many viewpoints will, as the park plan is developed, become more and more obnoxious; and the cost of the building, with the foundations and machinery, if once anchored there, is such that in the future its removal, if demanded, would be very costly to effect.

The projected development of the Island Park will be one of the most beautiful, interesting, and useful features of the whole Mall Park improvement. The Government owns the water front on the city side and has the power at any future time to alter the unsightly arrangement of the docks and make the water front an important feature, as is often done in foreign countries. The unsightly railroad bridges are near the site, but at some time, no doubt, will be replaced by tube conduits under the river.

When taking into consideration the island improvement now in progress in connection with the Mall extension plan, it will be seen what a dominant position the proposed power station takes in the ultimate Mall landscape. It will stand as a view pivot to anyone when driving in the southwest section of the Mall and north section of the island.

The building and smokestacks can no doubt be constructed to strike a high commercial note; but will it be possible to attune them to their park environment? It is imperative, in order adequately to consider the question, to study very carefully the plans of the future development, for without them the obnoxiousness of the site can not be understood.

No plea is made for the immediate extensions and expenditures necessary for the full development of the park scheme, but it should be conducted upon long agreed upon plans, and with self-control from each generation, and in such a way that there descendants may have a fair chance to further build on and extend the work and be grateful to their forebears.

A fundamental objection to the placing of this great power plant so near the Mall is that it is in opposition to the best judgment of the members of the Fine Arts Commission, composed of Charles Moore, Cass Gilbert, Herbert Adams, Peirce Anderson, Thomas Hastings, Edwin H. Blashfield, and Frederick Law Olmsted, who are well known and respected in art circles, and who believe in the necessity of developing the Mall on the original lines laid down and object to buildings and improvements not in attunement or harmony with them. They certainly should be safer guides in bringing about a development gratifying to the patriotic pride of this Nation than Congressmen and departmental officers, who come and go with each changing administration and who may be lacking in necessary training and knowledge of these matters.

If the Mall site were the only possible one where an economic power station could be placed, it might have strong justifications on economic lines; but is this the case? In my opinion this is far from being the case, and I claim that as good, if not better, economy can be obtained by the suitable extension of the present Capitol power station.

Mr. Stillwell, the consulting engineer of the Treasury Department, admitted before the Library Committee that he was not empowered to make a study of sites, and that he did not recommend the one chosen, nor did he make any estimates for a central power station taking in all the Government's requirements in the District. He also stated that the contract as now let for $1,459,000 was not enough to rightly carry out the work decided upon, and that as a citizen he did not recommend the present power site. No doubt the experience of underestimates as illustrated for the present Capitol power plant will have a good chance of recurrence for the Mall plant.

The Treasury's mechanical engineer, Mr. Thompson, has not claimed that he has studied nor has he publicly given any detailed estimate of serving all Government buildings and works with steam and electric power from one site. The operating costs of one central power station against the keeping in operation of three to do the same work need not be seriously discussed if the distances and other conditions permit the economical distribution of steam and electricity from one point.

As stated in my letter of the 5th instant to the Library Committee of the Senate, there would be a saving of nearly $50,000 a year in favor of an enlarged central power plant at the Capitol station in comparison with the plant proposed at the Mall in the performance of the same service with the Government Printing Office and the post office (new) added to the Capitol service. These two buildings are not included in the proposed service from the Mall plant. Let me make it clear that this saving of $50,000 a year is a further saving over and above all savings made possible by the plant for which the Treasury Department has planned. Taking the estimate of the Treasury Department engineers (which I do with reservation and only for purposes of comparison), there is a claimed economy to the United States of $177,000 a year by the use of the Mall plant. But assuming that their estimate is correct, the total saving by enlarging the Capitol plant, as above mentioned, would be the sum of $177,000 and $50,000, which is $227,000 a year.

The saving of such a sum as $50,000 a year in itself would justify a much larger first cost for the enlargement of the power station at the Capitol compared to a duplicate structure at the foot of Fourteenth Street. The Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, Mr. Elliott Woods, makes an estimate mentioning a much less cost. In a criticism of this estimate the Treasury's mechanical engineer makes his own figuring show that the excess cost at the Capitol would be under $5,000, and in no way controverts my contention that there is a great saving in the operating cost by doing away with one of the plants.

I fail to see why the Treasury engineers in their power scheme have not made provision for supplying power to the Government Printing Office from either the Mall or Capitol plants. Certainly here is a great chance of further economy, as at the Printing Office coal is brought to the fireroom in wagons, and two-thirds of it used under marine boilers fired by hand, while the condensing water is obtained from the water department after filtering. The Printing Office uses in its condensers some 2,000,000 gallons of water per day, some of which, however, is cooled and used again for other purposes in the building, but this, I believe, is less than a half of the amount taken from the water mains. The water department charges the public 40 cents per 1,000 cubic feet, which, if charged against this plant, would amount to over $100 per day.

The present Mall scheme for dealing with the Government buildings and works takes care of only about 17 buildings, whereas it is found from looking over the map of the city there are 29 points where electric power and steam are required, all of which could be supplied from the Capitol power site. The buildings, with their distance in a bee line from the Capitol site, are as under:

	Feet.
Agriculture	7,000
Bureau of Engraving and Printing	7,500
Capitol	2,700
Congressional Library	2,500
District Building	8,000
District Courts	5,600
Fisheries	4,300
Government Printing Office	6,500
House Office Building	1,600
Interior Department (new)	11,500
Lincoln Memorial	12,400
Medical Museum	4,800
National Museum	6,300
Navy yard	4,500
Old National Museum	5,400
Old Post-office Building	7,300
Patent Office	7,200
Pension Office	6,300
Post Office (new)	5,600
Senate Office Building	3,800
Sewage pumping station	3,500
Smithsonian Institute	6,000
State, War, and Navy Department	10,700
Treasury Department	9,600
War College (north)	5,000
War College (south)	8,000
Washington Monument	8,500
White House	10,200
Winder Building	11,300

These distances are roughly scaled from the center of buildings and power plant.

The three places using the greatest power are the navy yard, the Government Printing Office, and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. Although the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is much closer to the Mall site than to the Capitol, the navy yard and Government Printing Office are much closer to the Capitol site. There is no difficulty whatever in connection with the transmission of electrical power any of the distances given. The steam conduits are the only features needing consideration.

Though at first sight desirable, the consumption of power at the navy yard is so great that it would require most careful investigation before wise decision could be made as to the advisability of its being served from a central plant. If, however, it were found justifiable, there would be no doubt as to the superiority of the Capitol site, as compared to the Mall, the comparative distances being 4,500 feet and 10,000 feet, or 5,500 feet in favor of the Capitol station.

It is seen that the distance from the Capitol to the Printing Office is only 6,500 feet and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing 7,500, with greater coal consumption at the former.

The greatest distances shown are those of the Lincoln Memorial, 12,400 feet, and the Winder Building, 11,300 feet. At these points but little heating power is required, and the most economical transmission to these points is therefore comparatively a minor consideration. The points at which a large amount of steam is required at long distances from the Capitol plant would be the new Interior Department Building, 11,500 feet; the State, War, and Navy Building, 10,700 feet; and the White House, 10,000 feet. These distances are straight-line measurements, and the steam conduits would differ from them, but it would require most careful and exhaustive study and the taking into account of each power requirement of each locality before the conduit lengths could be accurately given. It is not probable, however, to any of the main points of large consumption, that these lengths would exceed 15,000 feet, which I have been assured by mechanical engineers is good practice, especially for the minor power consumers.

While attending the hearings of the Library Committee at the Capitol I was favorably impressed by the manner in which Mr. S. S. Thompson gave his testimony, and it is with regret and surprise that I read the letter he has sent the chairman of the Library Committee, in which he makes the statement that the Capitol power plant is practically 18,000 feet, or 3.4 miles, from the Winder Building, and bases some of his objections to the Capitol site on this fact. I find the straight-line distance from scalement of map only 11,300 feet. It seems to me that in endeavoring to uphold the child of his creation it was unnecessary and bad taste and imprudent to impugn the motives of other people, as he has in his statement, viz:

"When the facts about this aesthetic furore are brought out it is possible that certain statements made by the architects and others will be proved to be disingenuous, and that a part of the present opposition to the central heating, lighting, and power plant will be found to have been inspired by the Potomac Electric Power Co., which has fought the project, for easily understood reasons, from its inception."

The absurdity of such a contention can not be better shown than by a careful consideration of the proposal I have outlined for a grand central station established at the Capitol power plant and cordially approved by the "aesthetic furorers," for if a new partial power station, as recommended by him, at the Mall will injure the Potomac Electric Power Co., what will be the effect of the still larger and more perfect one at the Capitol site which is recommended by myself and associates?

Extensions from such a plant would not only be put into quicker operation, but could be started at once and continue as Government funds were made available until all the public buildings enumerated were served with power from this central station. The new Mall plant, however, would be ineffective in toto until entirely completed.

In connection with my suggestion that a new set of engineers in no way committed to the present plan be employed to make a preliminary survey and estimate of the whole problem, bearing in mind the harmonious carrying out of the plans of the park commission, I would suggest that experts be obtained as follows:

That the American Society of Civil Engineers, American Institute of Electrical Engineers, American Institute of Mechanical Engineers, American Institute of Mining Engineers, Association of Consulting Engineers, the American Institute of Architects each be asked to nominate a member who would be competent and willing to act on a commission, together with one distinguished landscape gardener to be chosen by the others, to investigate anew this whole problem of the most economical and suitable site for a power plant and to consider the first and working costs, with rough estimates.

That their work be of an advisory nature and with but nominal money compensation for their own service, but that all the costs of obtaining the necessary data for their assistance be borne by the Government, who would also give them other aid, such as access to the Treasury engineers' and architect's estimates, plans, etc.

The work should be that of a preliminary survey, and no detailed working plans should be made out before their proposals had been approved by Congress.

There should be two reports or recommendations—one taking in only economical and practical considerations, the other the utmost economy permissible while preserving the beauty and dignity of the park system.

These reports should contain estimates not only for cost of construction, but relative economy of working, and if it was found that the Mall site was the more favorable it should be stated at what sacrifice in cost the next best site could be built upon and maintained.

The suggestion that I have thrown out to make use of the technical societies is in line with the action of the President, when he requested these engineering societies to extend aid to the Naval Consulting Board in their work of collecting data for use in organizing the manufacturing resources of the country for the public service in case of emergency.

Yours, respectfully,

HENNEN JENNINGS,
Vice President American Federation of Arts,
Vice President Washington Federation of Arts,
Consulting Engineer.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask that the telegram which I send to the desk be read in connection with the matter the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] is discussing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be read.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

NEW HAVEN, CONN., February 14, 1916.

Senator FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
Washington, D. C.:

I respectfully urge delay sufficient to have thorough consideration of views of experts as to the wisdom of building power plant with chimneys in the neighborhood of Washington Monument. See my telegram and letter of February 3.

L. W. ROBINSON,
President Connecticut Chapter American Institute of Architects.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I ask that the conference report on the urgent deficiency appropriation bill be taken up for consideration.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I gave notice four days ago that I would to-day, immediately after the conclusion of morning business, call up the armor-plant bill, and I hope the Senator from Virginia will put off the consideration of the conference report until this matter has been disposed of.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I understood that the Senator from South Carolina desired to address the Senate this morning, but later I heard that he did not wish to do so. I am perfectly willing to give way to the Senator to address the Senate, but I am afraid the armor-plant bill will take up so much time that I think the conference report should first be disposed of.

Mr. TILLMAN. How long will it take to dispose of the conference report?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not think it will take very long, though there will be some discussion upon it. I have an idea, however, that the armor-plant bill will meet with protracted discussion.

Mr. TILLMAN. It may or it may not.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there will be a good deal of debate on the armor-plant bill. The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is necessarily absent, but he telegraphed me that he was extremely anxious to be heard upon that bill, and to be heard at length; he wishes to discuss it very fully. I also desire to discuss it. I have been very busy during the past week and have not been able to prepare what I desire to say on the subject; but I can assure the Senator that there will be a great deal of discussion. There is no desire to delay a vote upon the bill, but those who are opposed to it desire to be heard.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, it is very important to make some progress on appropriation bills, and I hope the Senator from South Carolina may see his way clear to acquiesce in my request, that the conference report be now proceeded with.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will give way until the Senator can conclude; and then I shall move that the Senate take up the other bill to which I have referred.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report has been heretofore printed in full in the RECORD. Is it desired that it be read?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I shall desire to have read a letter written to me by the Secretary of the Treasury, but not at the present time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not a part of the conference report. The conference report has been printed in the RECORD, and the inquiry of the Chair was whether the Senator from Virginia desired that it be read from the Secretary's desk? The report is printed and on the desks of Senators.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think it is unnecessary to read the report. I have no doubt every Senator can read it more satisfactorily in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Virginia whether or not he desires to say anything regarding the conference report?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I supposed that the Senator from Nevada would desire first to present his objections to the report and that I should then reply to such objections as he might see fit to make.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the urgent deficiency bill as it came to the Senate contained the following item "Washington, D. C., central heating, lighting, and power plant: For continuation, $600,000." The Senate committee added to this an authorization for an increase of the limit of cost for this plant from $1,494,104, previously authorized, to $1,669,104. To that item of the bill the Senate, after the report of the bill, added the following amendment:

Provided, That no work upon the construction of said plant shall be commenced until the plans therefor shall have been submitted to the National Fine Arts Commission for their approval, and approved by the President of the United States.

The plans referred to were made in the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury with the aid of outside experts. An Executive order, made by President Wilson in 1913 pursuant to a statute previously enacted, provides that there shall be no final action upon any building in the District of Columbia upon such plans until they have been submitted to the Commission of Fine Arts. In this case, through inadvertence, the Treasury Department claim—and I do not contest their claim—the plans were not submitted to the Commission of Fine Arts until after the contract was made. The Commission of Fine Arts disapproved of the plans and of the site for the building. The object of the Senate amendment, therefore, is to insure a careful consideration of these plans by the Commission of Fine Arts and their ultimate approval by the President of the United States before the work is allowed to proceed.

There has been much unnecessary confusion created in the public mind regarding this subject. The Treasury Department seems to regard itself as in a measure under indictment by the architects and lovers of art throughout the country, an indictment which it claims has been secured by false statements and as the result of misinformation. The Treasury Department seems to regard this movement as an attack upon it and also as intended to benefit a private and local plant engaged not in supplying steam and power, but simply in furnishing electric light and power.

A COMPLETE PLANT WANTED.

Now, I wish at the start to say that no one who has ever talked to me upon the subject has ever indicated any hostility whatever to a central power plant to be constructed and operated by the Government; on the contrary, they all favor such a plant; but they insist that it can be constructed on a more favorable site with reference to the beauty of Washington and with reference to economy of operation itself; that it can be constructed in such a way as to supply more public buildings than the plan at present contemplated will supply; and that it will serve a higher public use at a new site, without being the public defacement which the plant at the proposed site will be. So that I wish to clear the mind of the Senate of that misapprehension. This movement does not involve the abandonment of a central heating, lighting, and power plant; on the contrary, it involves a more complete plant, furnishing service to more public buildings, with greater economy, than the one contemplated.

I also disclaim any desire or willingness to attack in any way the Treasury Department. The authorization came from Congress for the construction of this plant. If a mistake has been made in its location, it was the mistake of Congress in the original law; and that mistake can only be rectified by the action of Congress. So far as I am concerned, I insist that Congress should be allowed to act in rectification of its own act without disturbing conditions being injected by an executive department of the Government.

Mr. President, where is this plant to be located? It is to be located to the south of and immediately adjoining the new building of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, the railroad tracks of the Southern Railway Co. alone intervening, and it is to be erected upon the commercial water front of Washington which lies between the Bureau of Printing and Engraving and the War College, a distance of about a mile, at the very head of that water front, a water front which it is intended to embellish in the future according to the highest standards of engineering and art, so that it may rival not only in utility, but in beauty, the Thames embankment, the Seine development in Paris, and the beautiful utilitarian development at Dusseldorf on the Rhine, a development which has made that water front known to combine above all others every device that tends to practical use and service, one of the most beautiful creations in the world, a place not only of use and of service, but a place for general recreation, to which the people of that city resort.

POWER HOUSE TO DOMINATE POTOMAC PARK.

This plan has been in the eye of the Burnham Commission, and tentative suggestions have been made with reference to that water front. It is not to continue in its present squalid and inartistic condition, with miserable sheds and rotting wharves. It is to be a great creation in which art and utility will be united. One suggestion made by the Fine Arts Commission is that along that entire water front there shall be an elevated esplanade with walks and driveways shaded by trees, a structure in the air 15 or 20 feet above the general level of the street, and built upon arches, so that people can pass along that beautiful esplanade without interfering at all or being interfered with by the activities of commerce, and can look down upon the river and the business activities below.

Mr. President, immediately opposite this water front and facing it is the Potomac River, and immediately opposite that is the lower Potomac Park, to the south of the Southern Railway. That park is now being developed. Plans have been made and are now being carried out for a stadium, for golf links, tennis courts, and for its highest development as a park.

The building to be constructed upon this site consists of a power plant. The plans made by the Treasury Department show four stacks. The plans presented to the Fine Arts Commission showed four stacks; but before the Committee on the Library the statement was made that it is intended at present to construct only two stacks. Obviously, however, four stacks will ultimately be built. These stacks will be pretty nearly 200 feet in height and will be seen——

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator wants to be exact.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. As I understand, the stacks will be 175 feet high.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Above the level of the river they will be nearly 200 feet high.

Mr. BRYAN. I think above the level of the river they will be about 182 feet high.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, whatever the height may be—and there is some confusion about that—I know it was said in the Committee on the Library, if my recollection is right, that the stacks would be 195 feet high, but they will be equally objectionable at 175 feet.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Where is it deemed by the Senator from Nevada that this power plant should be constructed?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that in a few moments, as I go on.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is true that the power plant itself will be obscured as you view it from the White House, because there are intervening the buildings of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; but the stacks will appear above those buildings. Let me add here that the buildings recently put up by the Government for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing are of a high artistic standard, and it is contemplated that ultimately the present old building of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, which is ugly and all the more ugly in contrast with the beautiful Mall which faces it on the north and west, will be taken down. The building of the contemplated heat and light plant can be seen, as I understand, from the Washington Monument and from the Lincoln Monument, and will be directly in front of a space to the west on the Mall that is reserved for monuments to be erected hereafter to distinguished Americans; for the plan of the Mall involves an east and west axis extending from the Capitol through the Washington Monument to and beyond the Lincoln Monument to the Potomac, and another axis from north to south extending from the White House through the Washington Monument down to Potomac Park, near which these great memorials will hereafter be constructed.

POWER HOUSE STANDS AT THE GATEWAY FROM THE SOUTH.

The site is at the very gateway of Washington from the south. The southern railways pass right by it. It will be almost the first prominent structure that will strike the eye as you come from the south; and it will present a most unpleasing and inartistic sight as compared with the beauty and the grandeur of the Washington Monument, the Lincoln Monument, and these suggested memorials to the south.

The Treasury Department is not to be charged with blame so far as the location of the site is concerned. That was inadvisedly, in my judgment, determined upon by Congress; and the question is whether it is too late for Congress to change its mind, and whether it is too late, if it does not change its mind as to the site, to insist that these plans shall be so made as to make this building as attractive as the purposes to which it will be put will permit. Under this amendment all these questions are to be considered by the Commission of Fine Arts, composed of the most distinguished architects and artists and landscape architects of the country, with the aid of experts in engineering. The question is whether we shall adopt that course or whether we shall say that there shall be no such consideration, and that these plans shall go through to a finality as they have been designed.

COST OF DELAY.

Now, with reference to the cost of delay: It is true that they have commenced construction; that is to say, they have commenced to excavate. They have not as yet commenced to put up the building. The loss in delay will be trifling.

I will state that this action does not involve the abrogation of the contract. This action simply involves a suspension of work until an expert inquiry can be made.

It looks to the consideration of the substitution of another site and the continuance of the contract for building at a more favorable site. It also looks to the consideration of other plans on the present site which may do away with the unattractiveness of the present plans.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. To what extent have they proceeded with that work?

Mr. NEWLANDS. They are simply engaged in excavating now. None of the structure as yet has gone up. I am told that the contracts have been let.

Mr. VARDAMAN. How much money has been expended; does the Senator know?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Oh, it does not look as if there has been more than $10,000 expended there at present; probably not that amount.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What is the amount of the contract?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The amount of the contract is over a million and a half dollars, I think.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Can the Senator state whether any penalty would arise if the contract should be rescinded?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not know about that. My impression is that the contract itself contains liberal provisions regarding modifications of the plans, but I do not know just what they are. There is no penalty provided; but I imagine, of course, that Congress would deal justly with these contractors if there should be any loss.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understood the Senator to say that the contract had been let.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. And my inquiry was whether, if Congress should undertake now to abrogate the contract made by its authority, the Government would be involved in a controversy for damages growing out of the abrogation of the contract?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that this action does not involve the abrogation of the contract. This action simply involves a suspension of work until an expert inquiry can be made.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. This action looks, however, to the ultimate abrogation of the contract, does it not?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It looks to the consideration of the substitution of another site and the continuance of the contract for building at a more favorable site. It also looks to the consideration of other plans on the present site which may do away with the unattractiveness of the present plans.

Mr. WALSH. Let me inquire of the Senator whether it will be possible to apply this contract to another building to be constructed at another place?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The contract, as I understand, contains provisions for modifications by the Government of the plans.

Mr. WALSH. But the Senator will agree, of course, that that could not apply to a transferring of the site from that place to a wholly different place.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not see why it could not. It seems to me there is no need of conducting any technical discussion of this matter.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. ROBINSON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator to permit me to continue for just one moment.

If the Government should say to this contractor, "We are not satisfied with this site; we propose to have substantially the same building, or perhaps a larger plant, constructed at another place, and you shall have the contract, and we will fairly consider all the losses resulting to you from delay," does any Senator here suppose that any contractor in existence who is capable of undertaking such a job would object? And if he should object, would not his objection be regarded as so unreasonable as to command the contemptuous disregard of Congress?

THE CAPITOL PLANT CAN BE ENLARGED.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if it is not possible to enlarge the existing power plant which we now have up here in the neighborhood of the Capitol so as to have one power plant for all the Government buildings? I have been told—I do not know how correctly—that if that plant were enlarged and power furnished from that single plant to all the Government buildings, it would save the Government $50,000 a year as compared with building this second plant.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will say that Mr. Elliott Woods, the Superintendent of the Capitol, has presented a statement in which he says that it is perfectly possible to enlarge the Capitol plant in such a way as to supply all these uses.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. So far as his estimate was concerned, he estimated only on the buildings that were included in the original authorization, and therefore made a lower estimate than for the proposed plant. He has since learned, however, that the proposed plant involves other buildings that are authorized in the amendment that is in this deficiency bill, so that his estimate is not to be regarded as applying to the entire area of service covered by the proposed plant. The engineer of the Treasury Department, in his statement, does not question that the Capitol plant can be enlarged, but says that the enlargement there would cost, I believe, $5,000 more than the proposed plant near the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. LODGE. But the saving would come in the operation?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The saving would come in the operation. I will state further that Mr. Hennen Jennings, an eminent engineer, a man of large experience, and a vice president of the American Federation of Arts, declares that the enlarged Capitol plant would not only supply all the buildings contemplated by the Treasury design, but that it would cover the Government Printing Office and the navy yard, two of the largest consumers of heat and power among all the Government structures.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator means the plant down here at Garfield Park?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The plant at Garfield Park, or near the Capitol.

Mr. LODGE. The Capitol plant.

Mr. NEWLANDS. He states that that plant would not only supply all the buildings contemplated in the present plant near the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, but that it would cover the Government Printing Office and the navy yard, which, as I have said, are two of the largest consumers of heat and power among all the Government structures.

Mr. LODGE. I only desired to bring out the economic aspects of the matter. I believe it will save the Government in the long run to operate only one plant.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me say that the Capitol plant there is now capable of supplying twice as much light, heat, and power as it is at present supplying.

Mr. LODGE. I am against putting two hideous chimneys in the midst of a park area; but that is apart from the question of economy, and I do not see that the Government would suffer if we enlarged the Capitol plant and operated only one plant.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just one moment?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I want to say that the Senator is mistaken in attributing to either the Treasury Department or Mr. Elliott Woods the opinion that heat can be furnished from the Capitol plant for the territory that will be provided for by this central plant. I have a letter from Mr. Woods, following a conversation he had with me, in which he says that he does not think heat can be transmitted for the distances that will be required. He further says that this estimate of cost was made for an entirely different project than the one contemplated and under contract at this time, and agrees that the addition to the Capitol power plant would cost a little more than it would cost to construct this new plant where it is being projected.

Mr. NEWLANDS. How much more, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is a very slight addition.

Mr. NEWLANDS. About $5,000?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Just about that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well. My attention has not been brought to the letter from Mr. Woods. I am aware that his original estimate, which was half a million dollars less than the proposed plant fronting the park system, did not cover all the buildings covered by the Treasury proposal, owing to a misapprehension on his part and his confinement of the buildings to be supplied to the ones contemplated in the original act. I learn for the first time that he is in doubt as to whether steam heat from the Capitol plant can be used advantageously at some of these far-distant buildings, such as the Lincoln Memorial, which is the farthest away, and which will consume very little power or heat, and the new Interior Department building, which is beyond the State, War, and Navy Department Building. But upon that matter I imagine Mr. Woods will admit that his judgment will yield to that of eminent experts who have appeared before the Committee on the Library, and who have declared that power and heat can be economically distributed anywhere within a distance of 10,000 to 15,000 feet; and the Lincoln Memorial is not more than 12,000 feet from the Capitol plant. So that, under the statements of these eminent engineers, men who have made a specialty of this subject, men who have constructed the largest power and steam plants in the country, it is entirely safe to construct a plant which will deliver heat and power within a distance of 15,000 feet. Mr. Jennings in his letter shows that almost all of the distances contemplated by the Capitol plant are not more than six or seven thousand feet, and that only 3 or 4 of the places to be served out of 20 or more are more than 10,000 feet away.

DISTANCES TO WHICH STEAM CAN BE TRANSMITTED.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury says, in his letter:

> From the engineering side it would necessitate the transmission of steam 3.4 miles and would burden a plant designed to care only for the legislative activities of the Government.

Mr. NEWLANDS. According to my information, I think the Secretary of the Treasury is mistaken in that calculation. The Lincoln Memorial is not 3.4 miles, as we all know, from the Capitol plant. It is only about 12,000 feet distant in a straight line. In the devious line of the avenues it might be two or three thousand feet more, but it would certainly be included within 15,000 feet, and these eminent engineers say that the construction of a plant is practicable and economical that involves distances of between 10,000 and 15,000 feet. I wish to insist further that these buildings beyond 10,000 feet do not constitute 5 per cent of the requirements imposed upon this plant—not 5 per cent.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, that is a remarkable statement in view of the statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury. He says, further, that the site selected by the department is—> within 800 feet of the buildings that will take 50 per cent of all the steam generated and nearly 40 per cent of all the electricity generated.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Within 800 feet?

Mr. BRYAN. Within 800 feet of the buildings that will take 50 per cent of the steam.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Oh, he is undoubtedly talking about the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is right next door, of course, to the proposed Mall plant.

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, no; I do not imagine that would take half of the heat.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It will take a very large proportion of it.

If the Secretary will hand me the letter which I offered of Mr. Hennen Jennings, I will put his statement in the RECORD right here. Mr. Jennings is an engineer of large experience and of great accuracy. Now, what does he say?

Recollect it is perfectly safe to construct a plant that will deliver heat from 10,000 to 15,000 feet, and he has made the measurements here.

The buildings to be served by the suggested enlargement of the Capitol plant with their distances in a bee line from the Capitol site are as follows:

	Feet.
Agriculture	7,000
Bureau of Engraving and Printing	7,500
Capitol	2,700
Congressional Library	2,500
District Building	8,000
District courts	5,600
Fisheries	4,300
Government Printing Office	6,500
House Office Building	1,600
Interior Department (new)	11,500
Lincoln Memorial	12,400
Medical Museum	4,800
National Museum	6,300
Navy Yard	4,500
Old National Museum	5,400
Old Post-Office Building	7,300
Patent Office	7,200
Pension Office	6,300
Post Office (new)	5,600
Senate Office Building	3,800
Sewage-pumping station	3,500
Smithsonian Institution	6,000
State, War, and Navy Department	10,700
Treasury Department	9,600
War College (north)	5,000
War College (south)	8,000
Washington Monument	8,500
White House	10,200
Winder Building	11,300

These distances are roughly scaled from the center of buildings and power plant.

Thus, out of 28 structures, there are only 4 that are beyond the 10,000-foot limit, and those all buildings of limited consumption.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, let us see what he says.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me ask the Senator——

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will just let me complete this quotation:

> The three places using the greatest power are the Navy Yard, the Government Printing Office, and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Those are the three that are the largest. They are all within 7,000 feet. Let us see about the Government Printing Office, 6,500 feet:

> Although the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is much closer to the Mall site than the Capitol, the Navy Yard and Government Printing Office are much closer to the Capitol site. There is no difficulty whatever in connection with the transmission of electrical power any of the distances given.

Mr. BRYAN. May I ask the Senator a question before he gets too far away from those distances?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. I understand those are the distances in a direct air line.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. And do not indicate the distance by the pipes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is safe to say that that will be from a straight air line not more than a fourth or a fifth at the most, because of the many diagonal lines which our streets and avenues pursue in the District of Columbia.

Mr. President, the largest consumers of heat and power, recollect, are the navy yard, the requirements of which are not met at all by the plant near the Mall; the Government Printing Office, the requirements of which are not met by the proposed plant; and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, the requirements of which are met; and probably the least of all these in its requirements is the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

CAN A POWER PLANT BE ARTISTIC?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have been much interested in the Senator's remarks. Is it not practicable to construct an artistic building for a heating plant?

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is one of the things I should like this Commission of Arts and this committee of experts to determine. I have no doubt that if they can so determine they will take that into consideration. That is one other question that we want passed upon by experts.

Recollect, this Commission of Arts was called upon to act after the contract had been made. Certainly no one will state that smokestacks are a beauty. We have not been able as yet to procure the perspective of the proposed power plant, but I should like one of the pages to pass around to Senators the picture of a power plant which now exists, with only two stacks, near a park in Detroit, constructed, I believe, there by a private organization. It is regarded as an eyesore and detracts greatly from the beauty of that park. I will ask the page to pass it around to Senators. It is not presented, of course, as a picture of the proposed plant.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE REQUIREMENTS.

Now, Mr. President, regarding the Government Printing Office, which is not included in the proposed plan, and which all must admit must be an enormous consumer of power. There I am told they take from our water mains 2,000,000 gallons of water a day for the purpose of condensation—not water from the Potomac, not the muddy water that would be taken and is taken up by the Capitol power plant, and would be taken up by the proposed plant near the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, but filtered water—water filtered at an enormous expense by the Government—purified water used in machinery and for purposes of condensation. The quantity is 2,000,000 gallons a day. The total consumption of the District of Columbia is 150,000,000 gallons a day; so that that one plant consumes one seventy-fifth of the entire consumption of the city of Washington. That is one of the extravagances which is going on to-day and is not taken into consideration at all by the proposed plan, whereas the Capitol plant can supply the Government Printing Office with the necessary power and the condensation will be done at the Capitol plant with water pumped directly from the Potomac River, within a short distance of the plant.

HIDEOUSNESS BLOTS OUT BEAUTY.

Mr. President, I have commented upon the fact that this proposed plant is at the southern gateway of Washington. I appeal to every man from the South to protest against the desecration of that gateway by the erection of such a structure. The first thing striking the traveler from the South will be, in a large degree, this plant, and we know how hideousness will often blot out beauty. Put a beautiful thing and a hideous thing before the eyes at the same time and the hideous object will attract the eye first. So there we have the existing Washington Monument and the Lincoln Memorial, and also the other future memorials contemplated to the west of and within 1,000 feet of this proposed plant; and you will have this power plant vying in competition with them as to the impression which will be made upon the incomer to Washington.

Mr. President, the American people have not yet started upon the question of waterway development, nor have they started upon the question of beautifying their water fronts. Throughout the United States the water front is, as a rule, the most neglected part of every city, occupied by wretched buildings, unsightly wharves; but if we go to Europe we find quite the contrary. If we go to Asia, we find quite the contrary. Spanish art made the harbor of Manila a beautiful harbor. When our engineers, without artistic quality, were placing structures in the Philippines in vivid contrast with the art that Spain left there, Mr. Taft summoned Burnham, once the president of this art commission, to Manila for the purpose of utilizing his views in the preservation and the continuation of Spanish art, and he made a plan for the water front of Manila which resulted in a development there that is charming to the eye.

BURNHAM'S WORK AT MANILA.

While I was in Manila I stopped at the house of the secretary of the interior on the Pasig, and there within view from the portico in the rear was a magnificent cathedral erected by Spain. I greatly enjoyed that view. I went out there repeatedly to see it; but one day I moved a little farther along the portico and saw a space at the side of the cathedral which had hitherto been concealed from view by an intervening tree, and there I saw an ugly structure of corrugated iron that had been erected as a storehouse by the United States engineers, a structure for a utilitarian purpose, but which absolutely killed the beautiful architecture of that civilization which we had displaced.

So, also, I saw a bridge constructed by our engineers across the Pasig River near the beautiful bridge of Spain. There was a great artistic structure, one that would vie with the best structures of the kind anywhere, and here was this engineer's bridge, utilitarian, it is true, but of an incomparably ugly sight, its ugliness intensified by the beauty of the Spanish building. Mr. Burnham was called there by Mr. Taft to stop such abuses, and he did so.

THE BURNHAM PLAN FOR SAN FRANCISCO.

In San Francisco, where we have an incomparable harbor, an incomparable location for a beautiful city, the city of San Francisco sprang up under the development which is the usual accidental western development, the water front neglected, a spot of mange in that incomparable scene, embracing bay and island and mountain and Golden Gate and ocean. That community has existed for about 65 years under American rule. When the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] was mayor of San Francisco, realizing the necessity of improving that city upon artistic lines, he secured Mr. Burnham's services in the development of a great plan for its future development. The earthquake and the fire came and a large portion of San Francisco was destroyed. San Francisco failed to avail itself of the opportunity which Baron Haussmann would have welcomed in Paris. Baron Haussmann was compelled to destroy a large portion of Paris in order to create the present incomparable development of radial avenues, embankments, and parks, whilst there in San Francisco the ground was, by the destruction effected by the elements, prepared for such an undertaking.

Instead of availing themselves of the plan which had been provided by the wise and artistic foresight of my friend from California, the beautiful Burnham plan, the people of that city, intent upon a hasty restoration, started in upon that development, and whilst the restored city stands as a monument to the incomparable energy and courage of a people each one of whom carries more individual weight than any individual in any other community I have ever known, yet the buildings, whilst each of them may be fine and perfect in itself, lack that harmony, that sympathy of relation to each other, which they would have had had they been constructed under definite plans directed by the leading artists of the country.

But San Francisco has waked up. She developed the idea of the great exposition at a time when the world was entering upon the most destructive war in history and brought it to a successful completion. What did the business men of that city do, composing the direction of that exposition company? What did the men of enterprise and energy and industry and character do? Did they do as the average American does—that is, assume that any American can do anything—or did they conclude to put the matter in the hands of the expert architects and artists and engineers and landscape architects, the best talent that they could secure in the country? They determined upon the latter. They arranged the financial matters. They told them the limit as to the amount, and they put that construction in the hands of the artists and engineers, and the result was a creation that surpasses anything of its kind in the history of the world, developed by a community not more than 70 years old, an instruction to the entire world as to what could be done with a water front.

SAN FRANCISCO TRANSFORMS A WATER FRONT.

They took a place that was as dismantled and dejected and miserable looking as the present commercial water front of Washington and transformed it into a thing of beauty. What was the result? The people from all parts of the world and from all parts of the country have come to see, not so much the exhibits contained in the industrial buildings as the incomparable creation itself of men skilled in engineering, landscape architecture, and art. It has been a valuable commercial asset to San Francisco, and, realizing the commercial value of beauty, San Francisco will doubtless enter before long upon the renovation and restoration and beautification of the entire commercial water front, adopting the methods that are now being pursued in Rotterdam, adopting the plans that have been pursued in many of the Asiatic ports which are far beyond ours in beauty, making the entire front, through the offices of the engineers, not only one of great utility, but, through the offices of architects and artists, a thing of incomparable beauty, and before many years you will see San Francisco not a spot of mange in a beauteous scene, but vying with nature itself in beauty.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

THE WASHINGTON WATER FRONT.

Mr. PHELAN. I desired the Senator to yield for the purpose of making an interrogation. Since he mentioned the name of Daniel H. Burnham, who is the author of the plan for the adornment of San Francisco, it occurred to me to find out as a very important matter, in my judgment, whether the plans prepared by the same distinguished gentleman for Washington embrace what is now known as the commercial water front and where it is proposed to locate the new power plant. I have sent to the Library Committee within the hour for a copy of the Burnham plan. It has been promised, but I have not received it. However, the Senator knows of his own knowledge that it embraces the commercial water front.

Mr. NEWLANDS. You will find in that plan a design for a water front embracing the construction of an elevated esplanade above the level of the commercial street, upon which there will be a parkway with trees and vegetation, a place for automobiles to go, a place for carriages to go, a place for pedestrians to go, lifted above the arches beneath created for the convenience of commerce, and lifted above all the activities of commerce, but without interfering with them at all.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada permit me to make a statement at this point?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

DAMAGES DUE THE CONTRACTOR.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am very sympathetic with the thought of retaining and maintaining, as far as possible, the beauties of Washington and of the District of Columbia; but, touching the matter which is now before us for discussion, I wish to say that I called up the Supervising Architect of the Treasury. I was under the impression that there was incorporated in such contracts of the Government a provision that it was within the power of the Government to alter, modify, change, or even to annul a contract. I thought I had seen that provision in other contracts. In reply to my inquiry, the Supervising Architect of the Treasury within a few moments informed me that the department has no authority, except to modify or change the building after the contract is made, which he alleges in this case has been made and that we can not change it in anticipation of moving or changing the location of the building anywhere else; but in that case that the Government would be liable for such damages as the contracting parties might make it appear they had sustained.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask the Senator from New Jersey, as a practical man, whether he thinks that any contractor who has a contract to erect a million and a half dollar building upon a particular site will make any serious objection, involving the loss of any very serious amount to the proprietor, to constructing a building equal in cost upon a site within a half mile or a mile of the contemplated site?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will say, generally, that I should think not; but I do not know what a contracting party, with a contract involving the amount of money which this does, might do. It does seem to me, however, that the Government might annul the contract, or might, at least, take steps to annul it, and that then the Government would be liable to such damages as the contractor might be able to establish in court. I do not imagine, however, that the damages could be made to appear as very extensive in this case.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does not the Senator from New Jersey suppose, if we simply suspend the construction of this building in order to give the Commission of Fine Arts and the President time to look into the whole question, that the Commission of Fine Arts and the President will also consider the matter which he suggests?

THE FALLS OF THE POTOMAC.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think they would; and, personally, I should like such a cessation of this work as might make that possible. I want to live to see the day, and I trust it may be before the expiration of my term, when some steps will be taken to harnessing the great water power in the Upper Falls of the Potomac to do very much of this work.

Mr. NEWLANDS. A study of this subject might have that result.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think it would be encompassed in the same general inquiry.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to inquire at this point of the Senator from Nevada if the law to which he refers does not contemplate that before the construction of this building, or the letting of the contract, the plans for its construction shall be passed upon by the Fine Arts Commission?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course; and that that has not been done is what I am complaining of.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Was that done in this instance?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The plans were not presented to the Commission of Fine Arts until after the contract was let, and the Commission of Fine Arts has objected to them.

Mr. VARDAMAN. How does the Senator account for this ignoring of the law by the officers of the Government who let the contract?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, Mr. President, I am not disposed to harshly criticize the Treasury Department. They insist that it was the result of inadvertence; that it was not intentional; but nevertheless that is a fact.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, my question was not asked in any censorious spirit; but the point is that if this contract has been let by the officers of the Treasury Department in violation of the law, which required before it should be let that the matter should be passed on by the Commission of Fine Arts, then the contractor can not complain if matters are corrected after the contract has been let.

THE COMMISSION OF FINE ARTS.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to answer the question which the Senator from Mississippi has just asked. I hold in my hand the act creating the Commission of Fine Arts. It provides:

> It shall be the duty of such commission to advise upon the location of statues, fountains, and monuments in the public squares, streets, and parks in the District of Columbia, and upon the selection of models for statues, fountains, and monuments erected under the authority of the United States and upon the selection of artists for the execution of the same. It shall be the duty of the officers charged by law to determine such questions in each case to call for such advice. The foregoing provisions of this act shall not apply to the Capitol Building of the United States and the building of the Library of Congress. The commission shall also advise generally upon questions of art when required to do so by the President, or by any committee of either House of Congress.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The contention of the Senator from Colorado is that it does not embrace buildings?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It does not embrace buildings nor the sites for buildings.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me read the act. [Examining.] Now, let me ask the Senator from Colorado a question. Does the Senator from Colorado know that an Executive order has been issued by the President of the United States requiring every official in charge of the construction of a public building in the District of Columbia to submit the plans for that building to the Commission of Fine Arts before final action is taken?

Mr. SHAFROTH. What power has the President to do that? When an act is passed, it meets the concurrence of the Senate, the House of Representatives, and the President, and that is the measure of their authority.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then, the Senator from Colorado contends that the President has done an unauthorized act? Is that his contention?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I contend that the President could make that suggestion, or he could make that order, but that the force of it, the strength of it, so far as law is concerned, is not in the law, and, therefore, it is not authorized.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator, then, states that the President could make such an Executive order, which would be binding upon officials, but that failure to comply with it would not void any contracts made under it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is nothing in the Executive order, as I understand, that requires that the location of a building should be submitted to the commission.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Ah, but here we have a situation where the commission have condemned the appearance of the building.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be, but the order is as to the character of the buildings. They can not limit where the buildings shall be put up by a private owner.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator from Colorado must recollect that in this case the plans for the building were not presented to the Fine Arts Commission until after the contract was let.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But the law does not require it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, let me go a step further.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator from Nevada yield to me just at this point?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator allow me to continue? I merely want to emphasize what I have said, because it comes right in this connection.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Very, well; I will not now interrupt the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The President did make an Executive order, as I presume the Senator from Colorado will admit, absolutely requiring plans to be submitted to the Fine Arts Commission before final action, and he did so under this authority in the law:

> The commission shall also advise generally upon questions of art when required to do so by the President, or by any committee of either House of Congress.

Now, did not the President, by this Executive order, require that the plans for every building should be submitted to the Commission of Fine Arts, and did not the statute authorize him to make that requirement, and, having made the requirement, if that requirement has been violated, does it not invalidate the contract which has been made under this law? I ask the Senator as to that?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, Mr. President, it seems to me that where a contract has been let by the proper authorities of the United States Government, the contractor at least has a right to rely upon the authority of the official who makes the contract; and, inasmuch as the Secretary of the Treasury is the official who signed this contract, it is binding upon the Government. There is nothing in what the Senator has read with relation to locations for public buildings, and the point which the Senator is making has more reference to location than to anything else.

Of course, every community and every part of the city of Washington would object to any kind of building that would emit smoke, and, accordingly, many people no doubt would absolutely refuse to consent to the location of such a plant in any part of the city. Thus the uses of modern civilization would be to a large extent hindered. It seems to me that a part of the city of Washington has been selected for this plant that is as free from objection to the citizens as any other that could have been selected, considering its accessibility to the public buildings that are to be served.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the question in this case was whether the Commission of Fine Arts had any function to perform under a law passed by Congress and whether the performance of that function was not defeated by the neglect, either willful or accidental, of an executive department?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

JURISDICTION OF THE COMMISSION OF FINE ARTS.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should prefer not to yield, if the Senator please, until I have finished the sentence. It is perfectly clear under the statute, which provides that—

> The commission shall also advise generally upon questions of art when required to do so by the President.

"Questions of art!" Do not questions of art refer as much to the site as to the structure that is to be put upon it? Could there be any broader authority for an Executive order to be made by the President with reference to supervision, not only of the structures themselves but of the sites of public buildings in the District of Columbia, and did not the President—not a former President but our present President, Mr. Wilson—issue an Executive order, all-embracing in its operation, absolutely requiring every official in charge of any construction in the District of Columbia to submit the plans to the Fine Arts Commission before final action?

It is unnecessary to determine whether the contractor can be saved by a technicality; it is unnecessary to determine whether the Government is not estopped by the action of its own officers in charge of a contract. We are not considering this great question upon refinements of that kind. We are simply stating that the intention of Congress was not performed; that the intention of the President was not performed, and we are asking what? A reversal of action? No; we are asking simply a suspension of action until the authorities charged by law with the exercise of a certain function shall have the opportunity to discharge that function.

SOCIETIES GUARDING WASHINGTON CALLED AUDACIOUS INTERMEDDLERS.

Here we have a provision in a statute appropriating $600,000 for this very structure, and when we ask simply for a reasonable time within which the President and the Commission of Fine Arts can look into this question and determine it—perhaps approving of this site, for all we know; perhaps approving these plans, for all we know; perhaps suggesting modifications in the plans themselves that can be easily executed without a change in the contract—we are told that we are standing in the way of a great public improvement, that the men who are engaged in this movement are audacious—that is the language of the Secretary of the Treasury—in presenting their views, and that the great aggregations of men and women in the United States composing our architectural societies and our art societies, gathered together in a federation of arts, represented in Washington by officials charged with the sacred duty of guarding Washington from spoliation are audacious intermeddlers.

CONGRESS HAS THE RIGHT TO CHANGE ITS MIND.

Mr. President, it was not my intention to indulge in criticism of the Treasury officials. I am simply contending that Congress has the right to change its mind and to get the information neecssary for action without obstruction by Treasury officials. But I must say that I am amazed that the motives of people who are engaged in this movement should be misconstrued. We are told in a letter, from which I shall quote extracts, written by the Secretary of the Treasury, that the real motive behind this whole movement is to protect a local plant engaged not in supplying heat but in supplying light to the District of Columbia, and that we who have some interest in the artistic development of Washington and in these great federated societies of the arts and of architecture are being used by and are the cat's-paw of a private corporation engaged in furnishing light in the District of Columbia. I am amazed that such an utterance should ever be put in a public document, and I forbear from the comment that it deserves.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator permit an interruption now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to ask the Senator if he will point out that part of the law which he claims authorizes the Fine Arts Commission, to which he refers, to interfere in any way with the location of a site for this plant; also whether there is anything in the Executive order of the President that applies specifically to the site of the plant?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to correct the Senator——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me for just a moment, I understood the Senator's argument a while ago was that the Fine Arts Commission ought to be consulted about the location as well as about the structure itself. What I want to know is whether there is anything in the law or in the Executive order that requires that they should be consulted about the location?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish first to say that the Senator is mistaken in assuming that the objection is only to the location. The objection is to the artistic appearance of the building itself, and it is insisted that a building of that character ought not to be located on that site. So there are two objections. Now, the Senator will admit that as to the mere question of the appearance of the building itself the Fine Arts Commission has jurisdiction, will he not?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will admit that the President has issued an order requiring that, because the Senator has said that the President has issued such an order as that. I have not seen the order, and I do not know what it contains.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will show it to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the point I have in my mind is this, if the Senator will permit me: If the Art Commission has nothing to do with the location of the site, and that is a matter for the determination of the officials of the Government without consulting this commission, and those authorities have selected the site, then of course the objection of the Senator must lie chiefly to the character of the structure which it is proposed to erect there. If that is the chief objection of the Senator, then I want to ask him whether or not it is a fact that although this commission was not consulted in the first instance, it has been consulted since the selection of the site, and has made no objection to the structure except to the smokestacks, which are necessary for a power plant?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will present in a few moments a statement of the Fine Arts Commission itself regarding that matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator answer that question for me—whether the Art Commission have not been consulted and the plans and specifications submitted to them, and whether they have made any objection to the structure except to the two smokestacks? And is it not a fact, if the objection of the commission lies only as to the stacks, that no power plant can be made effective or useful without these stacks?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is the Senator through?

Mr. SIMMONS. If that is so, Mr. President, it seems to me—and I am submitting the inquiry to the Senator because I want to hear him about it—if the site has been selected according to the law, and if the plans of the building have been submitted to the commission and they have objected only to the stacks, that their objection is to a matter that is absolutely essential to any power building, and that it does not apply with the force the Senator has seemed to give it in his argument, in view of the fact that the site has been selected, and properly selected.

A POWER PLANT WITHOUT STACKS.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to say, in the first place, that a power plant can be constructed without stacks if a forced draft is employed, though the operation may not be so economical; and, second, that there is a twofold objection by the Arts Commission. One is to the plans, the general appearance of the building, and the other is to the site. It is, of course, the case that neither the executive department nor the commission had the power to select a site. The site was selected by Congress two years ago, so that is settled. We are appealing now to Congress to have an investigation made in order to determine whether it is an advisable thing to change that site, and we are told by an executive department that we ought not to do it; that we ought not to consider the question whether our own action in the past was wise or not; and those who rise in this body and suggest that that action was not wise are put under certain imputations as to unworthiness of motive.

COMMISSION OF FINE ARTS OBJECTS TO BOTH BUILDING AND SITE.

The objection of the Art Commission is twofold: First, to the building itself and its appearance; second, to the site.

The Senator asks whether the Art Commission have any power under the law to determine either matter. I say that Congress has given the President the power to call upon them with reference to any question of art, and that question of art may apply not only to the building but to the site itself. The language of the statute is as broad as it can be:

> The commission shall also advise generally upon questions of art when required to do so by the President, or by any committee of either House of Congress.

The President in office in 1910—Mr. Taft—required this commission to give its advice, not by any special order, but by a general order, which reads as follows:

> Plans for no public buildings to be erected in the District of Columbia for the General Government shall be hereafter finally approved by the officer duly authorized until after such officer shall have submitted the plans to the Commission of Fine Arts, created under the act of Congress of May 17, 1910, for its comment and advice.

No plans were to be finally approved by the officer duly authorized until after such officer should have submitted the plans to the Commission of Fine Arts. These plans were approved before they were submitted to the Commission of Fine Arts.

Mr. SIMMONS. They have been submitted, however, since.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Ah; afterwards.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And approved?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; disapproved.

Mr. SIMMONS. Have they not been approved except as to the smokestacks?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No.

Mr. MARTIN of Virgina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S LETTER.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator from Nevada has repeatedly stated that there ought to be some time given for the President of the United States to investigate this matter. For his information I will tell the Senator that the President of the United States has investigated the matter thoroughly; and I have a statement in writing from him, with his authority to read it to the Senate, that he approves the location and approves the plans, and thinks the work ought to be allowed to proceed at once and be completed as soon as possible.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have great respect, of course, for the President's opinion regarding anything. I saw the President some days ago and presented to him a committee from the American Institute of Architects who wished to have this matter looked into, and we appealed to him to do what he could to prevent this structure from reaching a finality before competent experts had an opportunity to act upon it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. NEWLANDS. In a moment, if the Senator will just let me get through with this statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Later on I stopped at the White House and left word with Mr. Forster, requesting him to suggest to the President that he consult Col. Harts, the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, an Engineer officer in the Army of high standing, who by virtue of his office is secretary of the Art Commission, in reference to this matter, upon the assumption that Col. Harts, being an engineer and also being absolutely familiar with the views of the Commission of Fine Arts, with which he has been so long identified, would be a safe counselor.

I fear that the President did not call in Col. Harts. I received from the President later on a very courteous letter stating that he had called for the plans, had looked into the matter, and had approved the plans; but I have nothing at all to indicate that the President had as his counselors and advisers in the matter any but the Treasury officials. I had hoped that the President might be able to go outside of the Treasury officials, who were greatly interested in these plans and had approved them, and seek expert advice, disinterested advice, or at all events hear both sides. I do not believe the President will stand by the judgment which he has declared if he does hear both sides; and this amendment proposes simply to leave this matter to the President, with the advice and counsel of the Commission of Fine Arts, as provided for in this amendment, upon the assumption that he may change his view upon receiving the information that will come from thorough investigation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not propose to have much to say about this matter. It was my privilege to be a member of the committee—associated with me being the late Senator from Michigan, Mr. McMillan, and the senior Senator from Virginia, Mr. MARTIN—that made the report on the park commission plan of the District of Columbia. I need not say to the Senators who have been here with me that I have always stood for the proper development and beautification of Washington. I gave 22 years of my life to my duties as a member of that committee, 12 years as chairman of it, and devoted more time to the consideration of questions relating to this District than I did to matters connected with my own State, so that I need not apologize for any position I may hold on this question.

I want to ask the Senator from Nevada if he will kindly reread the Executive order to which he has just referred.

Mr. NEWLANDS (reading):

> Plans for no public buildings to be erected in the District of Columbia for the Federal Government shall be hereafter finally approved——

IS A POWER PLANT A PUBLIC BUILDING?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is enough. "Plans for no public buildings to be erected in the District of Columbia for the Federal Government." I will ask the Senator, in all seriousness, if a power plant is a public building for the use of the Federal Government in the District of Columbia. Does the Senator think it is a building of that kind?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think it is, of course.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator thinks it is? I have no idea that any such purpose was intended by the Chief Executive when he issued that order. It is proper that there should be very careful supervision of public buildings for the use of the Government in the District of Columbia, such as buildings for the several departments of the Government; but, however that be, I should be very little swayed by an Executive order. Congress is supreme in matters of legislation, and I do not think Congress would be willing, as the Senator from Nevada suggests, to delegate this power to the President of the United States. I think Congress is quite competent to take care of it for itself.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Nevada will permit me; yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Florida, with the consent of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I must object to dialogues in my remarks, Mr. President. I want to go on. I will yield the floor in a minute.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada declines to yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me just one word more; I am solicitous about this matter—quite as much so as the Senator from Nevada can be. If I believed the construction of this plant would be a blot upon the landscape, if I believed it would do violence to the artistic tastes of our people, I would not be in favor of it. But I am familiar with every foot of ground in this District, and I am honestly of the opinion that there is not another site in the District of Columbia that would be so free from objection for a plant of this kind as the one where it is contemplated to erect it; and I hope the Senate will agree to the conference report when it comes to a vote.

Mr. HUGHES and Mr. BRYAN addressed the Chair.

EXECUTIVE ORDER OF NOVEMBER 28, 1913.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] has also called my attention to an additional Executive order of November 28, 1913, as follows:

It is hereby ordered that whenever new structures are to be erected in the District of Columbia under the direction of the Federal Government which affect in any important way the appearance of the city, or whenever questions involving matters of art with which the Federal Government is concerned are to be determined, final action shall not be taken until such plans and questions have been submitted to the Commission of Fine Arts designated under the act of Congress of May 17, 1910, for comment and advice.

This is an Executive order that was issued by the present President, Mr. Wilson. The Executive order which I read before was an Executive order of May 17, 1910.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] asked the Senator from Nevada to quote the Executive order. I am going to ask the Senator to quote the statute under which the Executive order may be issued.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have already quoted it:

The commission shall also advise generally upon questions of art when required to do so by the President.

Mr. BRYAN. In the hearing before the Committee on the Library the Senator gave the act of Congress as providing that it should be the duty of the commission to advise upon the location of statues, fountains, and monuments. This building is certainly a public building.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The sentence I have quoted is in the same statute.

Mr. BRYAN. It is?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; the same statute.

Mr. BRYAN. The statute the Senator quoted in the hearings did not contain it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Oh, yes; the Senator will find it in the last two lines.

Mr. BRYAN. Then where is any authority given to the Fine Arts Commission to deal at all with public buildings?

Mr. NEWLANDS (reading):

The commission shall also advise generally upon questions of art when required to do so by the President.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator thinks that covers it?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; I yield.

FISH MARKET PLANS SUBMITTED.

Mr. HUGHES. About a year ago, as I recollect, we authorized the construction of a fish market right in this neighborhood for the government of the District of Columbia. Am I to understand that those plans and specifications should have been submitted to the Art Commission, or have they been so submitted?

Mr. NEWLANDS. They not only should have been submitted to the Art Commission, but they were submitted to it, and, under the direction of the commission, the plans were materially changed.

Mr. HUGHES. I was about to suggest that if they had not been they ought to have been so submitted.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The plans presented did not comport with what the commission thought should be the dignified and beautiful appearance of the waterfront of the city, and they disapproved them, and new plans are now being drawn pursuant to their suggestions. That building, recollect, whilst it is put to a utilitarian purpose, is to be a structure of beauty, as it ought to be, and it only illustrates what I said—that already under the direction of this Art Commission the Government is taking hold of this particular water front, and proposes to develop it not only upon lines of utility but upon lines of attractiveness and beauty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Nevada suspend? The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Tennessee if it is not agreeable to him to have the unfinished business temporarily laid aside in order that the conference report may be proceeded with until it is finished. Of course, as a matter of fact, the conference report has priority, but I am sure the Senator will see the justice of agreeing that the unfinished business shall be laid aside.

Mr. SHIELDS. The conference report being a privileged matter, I understand, I will ask that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily. I understand it will take a very little while to finish it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I gave notice four days ago that this morning immediately after the conclusion of the morning business I would call up the armor-plant matter. I want to get that matter before the Senate and to pass the bill as soon as I can. It is imperative that it should be passed with the utmost promptness. Senators here are discussing the ways and means of expediting matters, and, I think, if the Senator from Tennessee, who is very earnest and desirous of passing the water-power bill, would ask unanimous consent for a vote he can get it, and we will all be accommodated, and I can get my bill before the Senate and have it passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection——

Mr. OLIVER. What is the request?

Mr. TILLMAN. I shall be compelled to object unless some agreement is reached. I do not want to displace the water-power bill. Of course the Senate will do as it pleases, but I feel compelled to ask for a vote on taking up the conference report.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report which has been under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is a privileged matter, but there was an objection made, which compels a vote on the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. OLIVER. I should like to ask, if the motion is agreed to, whether it will displace the unfinished business?

Mr. SMOOT. It would.

Mr. OLIVER. I hope the motion will not prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will displace the unfinished business.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not see why the unfinished business can not be temporarily laid aside and the Senate proceed with the consideration of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was objection to unanimous consent.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will state what I am desirous of getting at. It is that the Senator from Tennessee shall ask unanimous consent to fix a day for a vote on the water-power bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that it would be impossible to secure that.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will yield.

Mr. OLIVER. I merely say that I object to laying aside the unfinished business, but if the Senator from Virginia insists on the motion let his motion come to a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to have a definite understanding about this matter. The Senator from Virginia has moved to proceed to the consideration of the conference report. If the Senate should vote to consider the conference report, in view of the fact that the general dam bill is the unfinished business what will the effect be upon this bill? Does it temporarily lay it aside until the conference report is disposed of, or does it displace it as the unfinished business of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair it displaces it as the unfinished business, and the bill which is now the unfinished business goes to the calendar. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it. The ayes have it.

Mr. OLIVER and Mr. TILLMAN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the report of the committee of conference on House bill 9416, upon which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have received a letter from Mr. Nathan C. Wyeth, a prominent architect here, relating to the Washington Architectural Club, which I will ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 14, 1916.

Hon. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The Washington Architectural Club, which has gone on record as approving the site of the proposed power plant for the Government, is an organization whose members are mostly employees of the Supervising Architect's Office in the Treasury Department. I am a member of this organization, but was not in any way consulted about this matter, and the sentiment expressed by them, I feel very sure, is not the sentiment of the leading architects of this city.

The Washington Chapter of the American Institute of Architects, whose membership includes the more prominent members of the profession of this city, passed a resolution at its last meeting disapproving of the proposed site for this power house.

Faithfully, yours, NATHAN C. WYETH.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSION OF FINE ARTS ON THE POWER PLANT.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask to have read the report of the Art Commission upon this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

JANUARY 31, 1916.

SIR: Immediately upon receipt of your letter of January 14, transmitting the plans for the proposed central heating, lighting, and power plant, by direction of the chairman of the Commission of Fine Arts, the subject was referred to a committee for preliminary consideration and report, and a special meeting of the commission was called for January 26, at which the report of the committee was received and further consideration was given by the full membership of the commission. At this meeting were present representatives of the Supervising Architect's Office of the Treasury, who answered inquiries concerning the plant.

The plans submitted indicate a structure the exterior dimensions of which are 178 feet 8 inches long by 126 feet 6 inches wide, and having a height of from 80 to 90 feet above the level of the river, upon which are four large chimney stacks each about 16 feet in diameter and stated to be 188 feet in height above the ground, or about 195 feet above the river. A structure of this size and character would obviously be conspicuous wherever located in the city. From the Capitol, from the White House, from Arlington, from the Mall, from the War College and the water approach to Washington, from the Lincoln Memorial, from East and West Potomac Parks, which are now being developed, and from many other prominent points in the city the proposed plant will be a disagreeably conspicuous object in the landscape. Its close proximity to the Washington Monument will seriously affect the simple dignity of that structure and its great bulk and huge stacks will cause a deplorable change in the entire aspect of that section of the city. Furthermore, as the location of the Lincoln Memorial by Congress in Potomac Park leaves the southern terminus of the vista from the White House southwardly toward the river the most important site for a memorial structure left in the National Capital, this site would lose much of its effect and dignity by the construction of the plant as proposed.

It is understood that prevailing winds in Washington are from the south and the southeast. This being so, smoke or gases arising from the plant would be distributed over the areas upon which are located the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, the Smithsonian Institution, the new National Museum, the buildings of the Department of Agriculture, the White House propagating gardens and conservatories, and the tree growths of the Mall, and other valuable properties upon which the Government has expended great care and vast sums of money.

The commission strongly disapprove of the plans for this structure as submitted and view with grave anxiety the location of any such plant on this site.

By direction of the commission.

Respectfully,

WM. W. HARTS,
Colonel, United States Army, Secretary.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am at a loss to know why the simple suggestion contained in this amendment should meet with opposition. We are proposing simply to allow a commission of experts and the President, with the aid of the best engineering talent in the country, to determine whether or not this building shall go on or whether its construction shall be suspended in order to provide either another building of a different appearance or another site.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Would it not be wiser to postpone the construction of this plant until the water power at Great Falls can be utilized, so that we would get our electric power from there instead of getting it at this plant? I ask the Senator that question.

ON FURTHER INFORMATION THE PRESIDENT MAY MODIFY HIS OPINION.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should say no to that. The Great Falls can not supply the steam heat that is necessary. That is evident. It is the main purpose of this plant to furnish steam heat.

Then, I am exceedingly desirous of taking no action that will indicate any disposition to delay the construction of a central heat and lighting plant. All I want is an opportunity for a suspension of the work until the informed judgment of certain officials can act. The fact that the President, upon an ex parte statement, I presume, of the Treasury officials, has approved, as the Senator from Virginia indicates, the plan does not affect my judgment regarding this matter, for whilst it diminishes possibly the chances of favorable judgment of the cause which I espouse by the President, yet I feel that he will act as he has heretofore acted upon fuller information, that his mind will not be closed, and that if information comes to him of such a character as I believe will come from the highest authorities of the country, both in engineering and in art, he will do as he has done before, modify his previously expressed conclusion.

Recollect that when this matter was presented to the Senate the Senate passed the act authorizing a plant. The Senate ought to have pride of opinion regarding it if anyone should have pride of opinion. The Senate immediately responded favorably, and without opposition put the amendment upon the appropriation bill as a reasonable amendment. That indicated the state of mind of the Senate.

ORIGIN OF THE OPPOSITION TO FULL EXAMINATION.

Whence does the violent opposition to this suspension of action originate? From the Senate, which is responsible for the act and which is now adopting the machinery for correcting any mistakes that might have been made? From the Senate, which, if anybody is entitled to pride of opinion, ought to have occasion to exercise it? No; the opposition does not come from within this body; it comes from without, and it is in the shape of the opposition of an executive department to permit the Senate to revise its own judgment. It is a practical declaration that the judgment of another department is to be imposed upon this body and to be accepted. We are not to have the right to revise our own judgment. We are not to have a right to reconsider our own acts. We are proceeding in haste, without exploiting the field of expert inquiry simply because another department of the Government has acted in violation of law and has refused or neglected—and I am willing to place the most charitable construction upon the neglect—has neglected to submit the question to a commission of arts authorized by Congress to exercise this function.

Mr. President, I submit that the Senate should hold to this amendment; that it should refer this matter back again to the conference committee, in the hope that they will come to some adjustment; and that if they do not come to such an adjustment, then that the Senate shall refuse to adopt this amendment to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill in its entirety, this amendment authorizing the expenditure of a million and a half dollars for carrying out the final judgment of the executive department, when the law says that that final judgment shall not be exercised unless the matter has been submitted to the Commission of Fine Arts, a body created by the law—and our servant.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

IS THE EXISTING CONTRACT LEGAL?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the law requires the department to submit the matter to the commission before making a contract and the department has not done so, there is no existing legal contract.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Not until we ratify it by our action. If we allow this amendment to go through, we ratify that contract.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But what I was calling the Senator's attention to was the argument certain Senators have made that we would be breaking the contract by suspending its execution. That would not be so if the law requires the submission of the plans for such a contract under such circumstances as are recited by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, this matter is pending before another committee. As soon as I heard of the proposed action regarding this building I introduced a joint resolution suspending action under this contract until the Commission of Fine Arts could have an opportunity to act upon the matter and the President himself should approve it. It was at the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] when that resolution came before this body that I offered the amendment to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, his statement being that there was a provision in the urgent deficiency appropriation bill which would enable us to get the relief which we sought by adding an amendment to it. So that amendment was added without a dissenting expression.

It is true that the Senator from Virginia at the time he assented to it indicated that he reserved the right to modify it and possibly—I do not know whether that was expressed—to reverse his action regarding it. The resolution which I have introduced will be pressed. This thing will not rest. The audacious action referred to in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of the members of the great architectural and arts societies of the country will not end. I know something of those organizations.

TO MAINTAIN THE WASHINGTON-L'ENFANT PLAN.

I have stood here with others during my 23 years' service in an effort to maintain the integrity of the original plans designed by Washington and L'Enfant and their full development.

The honorable ex-Senator from New York, Senator Root, was conspicuous always in the defense of those plans. President Taft was conspicuous also, and others acting with them have been able in this body to protect this plan from spoliation.

I can recall that when I first entered this body the Senate was engaged in what I thought at the time was almost a brutal debate, attacking a distinguished architect, Charles McKim, who, in the judgment of some of the Senators, had committed an unpardonable offense, when he planned the small office annex to the White House, by not providing for two stories. It was their contention that it did not meet the business requirements of the Executive offices, his contention being that the structure should be of so modest an appearance as to be inconspicuous, and not detracting at all from the general beauty of the plan of the White House. There was a long contention over that, and the artists won.

LOCATION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Later on Secretary Wilson, of the Department of Agriculture, acting under an appropriation given to him by Congress, proposed to erect the Agricultural Department Building, and disregarding the plan of the Mall, the boundary line of the Mall itself, he proposed to construct the building right across the line. He and those who stood with him—and he had numerous supporters in this body and in the House—thought that the views of the artists and architects of the country were not to be regarded, that the general artistic sense of the country was not to be regarded, and as he had the power he proposed to put the structure across the line.

An agitation commenced in this body which resulted in the passage of an act by this body compelling him to put the building back to the line. But the power of that department was so great among its friends in the House that it was utterly impossible to pass the bill there. At that juncture, as a result of the universal protest from all over the country, President Roosevelt, the Chief Executive of the Nation, intervened; and although the law charged the Secretary of Agriculture with the duty of constructing that building, the President directed him to put the building back of the line, and there it went.

A CIVILIZED, NOT A BARBARIC COUNTRY.

The lovers of beauty in this country are increasing every day. There are people in this country who realize that art belongs to civilization, not to barbarism. They propose that this shall be a civilized country and not a barbaric country. They are organizing art commissions in every State, with greater or less control over public and private structures. They are organizing societies throughout the entire country for the purpose of engaging in a propaganda regarding its artistic development. They propose to revive that artistic taste which existed among the gentlemen of colonial times, exemplified by devotion to the correct standards of art of such men as Washington and Jefferson; Washington, who made it a labor of love to stand side by side with the great French engineer, L'Enfant, in the planning of this city; Jefferson, whose solicitude regarding art is expressed in hundreds of letters and public utterances, who, whilst our representative in France, was so solicitous regarding the construction of a penitentiary in the State of Virginia that he requested delay in order that he might look at the best standards of art in France regarding the construction of even such a structure, and who later on practically planned the great University of Virginia, which has stood a model of beauty ever since, so much so that when some of the buildings were destroyed by fire they were reproduced by the great firm of McKim, Mead & White, who deemed it a higher duty to preserve to future generations the evidence of the artistic sense of Jefferson than to impress upon that work their own personality; Jefferson, who when the State of Virginia was considering the construction of a capitol urged delay until the best plans could be secured, and who, in a letter from France to one charged with responsibility in Virginia, declared with reference to objection as to loss of time—I quote from him:

> The loss (of time) should not be weighed against the saving of money which will arise, the comfort of laying out the public money for something honorable, the satisfaction of seeing an object and proof of national good taste, and the regret and mortification of erecting a monument to our barbarism, which will be loaded with execrations as long as it shall endure.

AN APPEAL TO THOMAS JEFFERSON.

I appeal to the Senators who represent the great Commonwealth of Virginia, so worthily represented in the councils of state by the great Jefferson, to bear in mind these words and to save themselves "the regret and mortification of erecting a monument to our barbarism, which will be loaded with execrations as long as it shall endure."

You may rest assured that that structure, with its two stacks, ultimately to be four, towering in the air will arrest the attention of every lover of beauty from the Old World who comes to the Capital and views them within sight of the monument erected to Washington, of the temple erected to the great Lincoln, and of the great temples which, I trust, will before long be erected to Jefferson and to Hamilton. I appeal to the Senators from Virginia to see that this act of barbarism is not committed. This structure will be torn down before many years. The relentless movement of the artistic sense of the country will in the end control, and the temporary judgment of this hour will not stand against it.

Mr. President, I trust that this body will be conscious of its own dignity; will be conscious of its right to change its mind, of its right to adopt the processes by which its mind can be informed, and of adopting methods which in the future will secure perpetual harmony in the plans of Washington instead of chaos and discord.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). The Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. At this time, I desire to suggest that my colleague [Mr. ASHURST] was called from the Senate a few moments ago on important business in one of the departments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

CHANGING A CONTRACT.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I am deeply interested in regard to the location of this proposed lighting, heating, and power plant. I have received scores of letters from very prominent men not only in this city but outside of it in protest against the site which has been selected for that purpose. I visited the proposed site some two weeks ago, and I am fairly well acquainted with the situation. As I have previously stated this morning, I communicated with the Supervising Architect of the Treasury as to whether or not it was possible under our contract to annul it. He replied to me over the telephone that it was possible to alter and modify, but not absolutely to annul, the contract to the extent of providing for a new location. It occurs to me, however, that inasmuch as the construction of this building is so entirely in embryo, it is surely within our right, and, I believe, within the lines of good sense and in accordance with justice to take some step which shall prevent its further progress.

I can understand that if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] shall be sustained, and the matter go back to the conference committee, the contractor will be continually working on the construction of the building and thereby accumulating further cost to the Government. In order to check that I offer the following resolution:

Joint resolution.

Whereas the construction of the anticipated central heating, lighting, and power plant on the bank of the Potomac, now under way, has aroused public sentiment in protest to further work: Therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the contracting parties for said construction are hereby notified to cease further work on said building or grounds until further consideration of the subject by the art commission and the President of the United States may be had.

If this resolution shall pass this body, it would, at least, be a public notice to the contractor that if he proceeded in the expenditure of money in further construction he would do so at his own loss and at his own peril. I therefore trust, Mr. President, that the Senate may adopt the resolution.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, of course, I suppose the Senator from New Jersey knows that such a resolution is now out of order, and can not, therefore, be offered in the midst of the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was not aware of that.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is plainly out of order.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Still, I stand for all the sentiments contained in the resolution.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I exceedingly regret that I feel it my duty to occupy some of the time of the Senate in connection with this matter. It is really very important. In addition to the importance of the subject, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has occupied more than two hours in antagonizing the report of the committee of conference. I therefore feel compelled to devote some time not only to replying to the Senator from Nevada but to a presentation of the subject in its true aspects.

I think the Senator from Nevada, at the outset, appealed to Senators to resort to their imaginations in considering this proposition. The Senator has certainly set an example of that sort. His imagination has taken possession of him. He has delivered a very eloquent disquisition on the fine arts, and Senators who have not some previous knowledge of this matter may misunderstand, and no doubt will misunderstand, the real nature of the question which is now before the Senate.

Before I come to a discussion of the merits of the proposition, I will refer to an allusion made by the Senator from Nevada to the failure of the conferees on the part of the Senate to adhere to his amendment. He stated that he did not know what outside influence could have controlled the course which the conference committee took. Mr. President, it is very easy for a man with a vivid imagination to conjure up all sorts of influences which may have thwarted the purposes which he had in view, but I will invite the attention of the Senate to the circumstances under which the amendment of the Senator from Nevada was adopted on the floor of the Senate. The amendment came very unexpectedly to me, and I am sure it came very unexpectedly to Senators generally. I stated from my position here in the Senate that I was willing, so far as I was concerned, for the amendment to be adopted, with a distinct statement that I must not be considered as giving my approbation to it, for I did not know enough about it to have an opinion one way or the other; that it came as a surprise; and that I was willing for it to go on the bill simply for investigation, and without myself being committed to it in any sense. Realizing that the Senate acted on that same idea, that very few Senators knew anything more about it than I did, I feel that there was little occasion for the Senator from Nevada to talk about outside influences preventing a fair consideration of his amendment.

Mr. President, before I go into the history of this matter, I must make a correction of the position taken by the Senator on Saturday afternoon and repeated here to-day. He says the contract for the erection of this building is invalid, because the law was violated in that the plans and the question of location were not referred to the Commission of Fine Arts; and, secondly, that the contract is illegal because it violated an Executive order which directed that the Commission of Fine Arts should be consulted concerning the construction of the proposed power plant. In the first place, I will refer to the Commission of Fine Arts. The plans for the projected improvement were not referred to them in advance, but they have been referred to them since the contract was let; and the Commission of Fine Arts themselves say that they have nothing to do with the matter. Neither the law nor the Executive order, according to the statements made by the Commission of Fine Arts, gives them any function in reference to it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him where he finds authority for that statement?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will read it in just about two minutes, if the Senator will give me an opportunity. The report of the Commission of Fine Arts, to whom the project was finally referred, has been read from the desk; and it makes no objection, no comment, no criticism except as to the location.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I dislike to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am perfectly willing to be interrupted.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] will let me have the report, I will show the Senator from Virginia——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I should like to be shown. I only heard it read at the desk, and, if I am mistaken, I want to be corrected.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Commission of Fine Arts say:

Its close proximity—

Speaking of their objections to the building—

Its close proximity to the Washington Monument will seriously affect the simple dignity of that structure, and its great bulk and huge stacks will cause a deplorable change in the entire aspect of that section of the city.

Then it goes on——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator does not mean to say that that refers to anything except the location, does he?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Then his idea of the English language and mine differ widely.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not wish to take up the Senator's time, but I am trying to pick out the excerpts which are pertinent. There are other sentences that relate to this matter, according to my recollection, but the communication closes:

The commission strongly disapprove of the plans for this structure as submitted—

And then they add:

And view with grave anxiety the location of any such plant on this site.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The only objection they have made in what the Senator has read is as to the location.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can not understand how the Senator can construe that language in that way, when they say:

Its great bulk and huge stacks will cause a deplorable change in the entire aspect of that section of the city.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is due to the location.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is a question of art.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If it were not located there, it could not cause that trouble. No matter how big it might be, if it were located 10 miles away, it could not make all that trouble.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Commission of Fine Arts do not oppose the erection of a central power and heating plant; on the contrary, they believe in such a plant of the largest capacity.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. But they point out no objections to this plant.

Mr. NEWLANDS. They say it is a question of art as to whether the proposed building in that particular place is designed in such a way as will reflect credit upon art in the city of Washington.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is true; but they make no criticism of the plans; they criticize the location. They do not say that the design is not proper; they do not say the new building will be unsightly; but they say it will injure the beauty of the city if located upon that site. After hearing what the Senator has read, I repeat that the only objection made by the Fine Arts Commission is as to the location of this plant. Now, if the objection is only to the location of the plant, what have they got to do with that? We will see what they say. They say they have nothing to do with it. Mr. Gilbert in his testimony before the Library Committee says:

The conclusion of the Commission of Fine Arts was that the plant at that location would be seriously objectionable, but having respect for the action of Congress, and deeming it not only our function to establish a location——

Right there, let me say that, if Senators will read that sentence, they will notice there is a word there that ought not to be there. I sent for and obtained a copy of the original, and the word "only" ought to be stricken out. It makes no sense in the sentence and the original shows that it ought not to be in. So reading it correctly, it says:

The conclusion of the Commission of Fine Arts was that the plant at that location would be seriously objectionable, but having respect for the action of Congress, and deeming it not our function to establish a location, we could only express our great anxiety as to the result if a plant was located at that point.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, read the next sentence.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will read it. It is as follows:

We could, however, within our function, as established by Congress, and as required by our presidential appointments, express our opinion as to the aspect of the plant, as to its appearance, and on that we were unanimous that it would be a seriously objectionable feature in the aspect of the city of Washington.

That is, located at that point.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator permit me another question?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does he not consider that "a question of art?"

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I consider it a question of location. There is no question of art here disconnected from the question of location.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But the Senator will admit that it is "a question of art," will he not?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Well, I am not going into any discussion of that. I am not at all clear that it is a question of art.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is the principal question.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The proposed building will be a utilitarian plant, and there are involved, no doubt, some artistic considerations. An inartistic building anywhere is objectionable in one sense. You may bring the principles of art to bear on almost anything.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Recollect that the statute authorizes this commission to advise generally upon questions of art when required to do so by the President.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the Senator is not a lawyer. I do not like to use extreme language, but I am almost sorry for a man who says that the letting of the contract for this building was a violation of the statute. I will read it to show that I am not taking an extreme position. A man with an imagination might take that view.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state to the Senator that I have made a feeble attempt in the past to be a lawyer and was regarded as fairly successful.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Well, it was so long ago that the Senator has evidently forgotten his training if he can find anything in the law that has been violated by the letting of this contract. I quote from the law creating the Fine Arts Commission:

It shall be the duty of such commission to advise upon the location of statues, fountains, and monuments in the public squares, streets, and parks in the District of Columbia—

It is not contended that this is a statue, fountain, or monument, I am sure—and upon the selection of models for statues, fountains, and monuments erected under the authority of the United States and upon the selection of artists for the execution of the same. It shall be the duty of the officers charged by law to determine such questions in each case to call for such advice.

That is in connection with statues, fountains, and monuments.

The foregoing provisions of this act shall not apply to the Capitol Building of the United States and the building of the Library of Congress. The commission shall also advise generally upon questions of art when required to do so by the President or by any committee of either House of Congress.

They have not been required in this instance to pass upon the question by the President or by either House of Congress. So that there is absolutely nothing in the law which has been violated.

So far as the Executive order is concerned, Mr. President, it is but a directory order; it is an instruction by the Chief Executive Officer of the country to a subordinate officer to do a certain thing. If the subordinate should fail to do as directed by his chief, or if he should do anything disapproved of by his chief, he would be amenable to the discipline of that chief. If the President thinks that the Secretary of the Treasury has been wrong in not taking the advice of the Fine Arts Commission, he can remove him from office, but the President does not think he has done anything wrong.

As my friend from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] suggests to me, there is nothing in the law about buildings. Furthermore, the Fine Arts Commission say they have nothing whatever to do with the location of the building, and, so far as the Executive order is concerned, it is nothing, as I have said, but a direction to one of his subordinates that he shall do a certain thing. If he does not do that thing, he is amenable only to the discipline of his chief. His chief in this case approves his action. His chief wrote me a letter, which I will take the liberty of sending to the desk and asking the Secretary to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 10, 1916.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I was called upon the other day by Senator NEWLANDS and a committee of representatives of the American Institute of Architects, who protested against the erection of the power plant for which ground has already been broken at the foot of Thirteenth Street, and Senator NEWLANDS asked me to communicate with you on this subject.

I immediately took the matter up, studying the plat and the elevations, and must frankly say that I see no valid objection either to the site or to the erection of the building upon it, and it seems to me that the whole matter has been so thoroughly considered, and the plant is so necessary, that I should not be justified in asking for any delay of any kind.

Very sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. THOMAS S. MARTIN,
United States Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I am indebted to the Senator from Nevada for that letter. I have had no communication whatever with the President in respect to it, except that after the receipt of the letter—indeed, this morning—I communicated with him, and desired to know if it was agreeable to him to have that letter read in the Senate. He said it was entirely agreeable to him to have it read in the Senate. But for his consent that I should read it I certainly should not have mentioned it, but should have considered it as a letter personal to me.

So there is absolutely no invalidity attaching to this contract because the Secretary of the Treasury did not submit it to the Arts Commission. If he had submitted it to the Arts Commission, they no doubt would have replied at first as they did at the last, that it was not one of their functions to locate a public building. They have nothing to do, under the law or the Executive order, with locating a public building in the city of Washington. They have said so themselves, and I think they know as much about the functions which they are authorized to execute and which they are executing as any Senator on this floor. I have read to you their own statement that they had no function in locating a public building in the city of Washington, so that this contract is not invalidated by anything that has been done.

But let us see, Mr. President, what has transpired that gives that contract validity. Before I read the law I will say that this matter has not been taken up hastily. It has not been dealt with without consideration, without investigation, and without the advice of experts learned in subjects of this character. The necessity for a power plant in Washington was made manifest as far back as 1904, at which time Mr. Bernard Green, one of the most distinguished men who has been connected with the Government service here in 50 years—he died some few years ago—was instructed, by a statute which it is not necessary to take the time to look up, to get up and submit to the Congress a plan for the construction of a power plant. He got up a very elaborate plan. He called to his assistance Mr. Woodbridge, who was connected with the Massachusetts School of Technology, and a man of wide practical experience in constructing works of this sort; and Mr. Green, with the aid of Mr. Woodbridge, got up a report which was submitted to Congress on the 9th day of January, 1905. He says:

To insure thoroughness and reliability of investigation and report, I employed the expert services of Prof. S. Homer Woodbridge, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, because of his well-recognized academic training in both the science and practice of this special branch of mechanical engineering, his large practical experience in the actual designing and construction of heating and ventilating plants—including several of magnitude and complexity—and, more than all, his open and unprejudiced scientific mind.

So that the first plan gotten up for a central power plant in the city of Washington was gotten up by Mr. Green, with the assistance of this distinguished expert, Mr. Woodbridge, as far back as January, 1905, under the provisions of a statute passed in 1904.

The Congress, however, did not proceed with the construction of this work, and during the administration of Mr. MacVeagh in the Treasury Department he appointed another committee of three to make another study of this proposition. I go through this so that Senators may understand that the matter has been deliberately proceeded with and carefully handled, and the advice of great experts was utilized. I do not minimize the ability and distinction of the Art Commission, but there are others. Wisdom will not die with them.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to call his attention to one fact? That is, that while it is true that a most careful examination of this subject was made by the Committee on Appropriations, with the aid of such skilled men as Mr. Green, the examination was purely with reference to the economic question, and not with reference to the artistic question.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is another play of the Senator's imagination. He has no authority for any such statement. They considered the matter in all of its bearings, and they then advised this construction.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator knows that Mr. Green was a mechanical engineer.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That was his chief calling, but he knew a great deal about architecture and about landscape beautification. He was a broad-gauged man of varied learning and great ability; and Mr. Woodbridge was another of the same sort, but of even greater distinction and reputation than Mr. Green.

This matter was not disposed of at once. In 1911, as I say, the Secretary of the Treasury appointed a committee composed of Mr. C. A. McAllister, Mr. R. H. Chappell, and Mr. N. S. Thompson. Mr. Thompson is still in the Treasury Department. He was on that committee then. They made an investigation and a report; and I will say right here that in all of these investigations and reports the site now finally adopted was one of those recommended. The House of Representatives had a hearing on the first report made by this committee of three appointed by Secretary MacVeagh, and they directed a further examination by the same committee. The committee, after its second examination, made a report on the 9th day of January, 1913. Here is an extract from the report made by this committee, which had given a second study to this proposition, which had been so carefully studied by Mr. Green and Mr. Woodbridge. The second report of this committee says:

> The ideal site for a power house to serve the buildings hereinbefore named is the land and wharf property owned by the United States fronting on Water Street between Thirteenth and Thirteen-and-a-half Street SW., together with land owned by the United States on the Potomac River fronting on Water Street between Thirteen-and-a-half and Fourteenth Streets SW. This property should be used by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia jointly, under an agreement to be made between them, the central power house to occupy the western portion of the property, as that location is required for economical design of the plant. This location of the power plant, with the other factors hereinafter set forth, dictates that the Bureau of Engraving and Printing (old and new buildings) and the buildings of the Department of Agriculture should be served with high-pressure steam and direct current, and that all other buildings should be served with steam for heating and alternating current for power and light.
> The site referred to fulfills better than any other obtainable site the general commercial and engineering requirements relative to (1) reasonable cost of land; (2) situation so that fuel may be readily and cheaply supplied by a railroad spur, by boats, or by both, and that ashes may be readily disposed of; and (3) that suitable water in ample volume may be available for condensing purposes at minimum expense for pumping. This site also meets as nearly as possible the further requirement of being within reasonable distance of the buildings to be served.

Then he goes on about the design of the building.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Certainly.

IMPROVING THE WATER FRONT.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to ask the Senator if the location of this plant is in the area or section which is to be improved as other water fronts have been improved? Are there any changes in the great plan that was made by this architect some years ago for the development and beautification of the city? Is the section where this plant is to be located to be changed in any way? Are there parks to be made, and roads to be laid out, and other work to be done, in the great development of the artistic improvement and beautification of the city?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. This building militates against nothing of that sort, but facilitates it. It is south of the embankment on which the railroads run their trains. It is within a block or two of the fish market and storage house for fish. It is in the neighborhood of wharves, coal yards and lumberyards. It is in a location that has been dedicated for I do not know how long—I am safe in saying more than a quarter of a century—to commercial uses.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I understand that; but just a few years ago all of that section on the Potomac River was dedicated to the uses of alligators and snakes and things of that kind. The purpose of my question was to ascertain whether it was in the plan for the perfection of the great city of Washington that this section here, where this plant is to be located, is to be improved as other parts of the river front there have been improved?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. To the best of my knowledge, it interferes with no plan for the beautification of the river front. If you were going to make any improvements there with which this will interfere you would have to move away the railroad embankment; you would have to stop the railroads from running their trains through there.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want the Senator to understand that I do not think economy should altogether be sacrificed to art; but it seems to me that, if this is going to be an impediment in the way, the building of a great plant of this character—one which will have to be removed if that particular part of the city is to be improved as the other river-front sections west of that have been improved—is a matter that ought to be considered very seriously now.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. In my opinion it does not interfere with any legitimate plan for the improvement and beautification of the city.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator admits that a plant of this character would not ornament a park?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Well, I do not know. It improves it very much over anything that has been done. If the Senator will look at that map, for instance, he will see the smokestack of the Potomac Electric Power Co. That and 17 others that are there now will be removed and we will have only this very ornamental building and those two unobtrusive and rather attractive smokestacks in place of the 17 that are to be taken away.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I agree with the Senator that it may be an improvement on the smokestacks that are there now; but I am sure the Senator will agree with me that it would not be entirely in accord with the eternal fitness of things to build a plant of that kind over in the park.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is not in the park, Mr. President. I told the Senator that it is not on the Mall, and it is not in any park at all. It is on the river front, on a part of the river front that is dedicated to commercial purposes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Five or six years ago that part of Potomac Park west of the railroad was nothing but a lagoon, the habitat of mosquitoes.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. We must have some wharves here. We must have some facilities for commerce and for transportation. This property was bought for commercial uses, and has been dedicated to commercial uses.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If it is to be dedicated to that purpose in the future, then I most heartily agree with the Senator that the building of this power plant would in no way disturb the harmony and beauty of the landscape.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It can be and must be dedicated to commercial uses if you are going to permit any commerce to come here at all. There can not be a less objectionable place for commerce of that kind to get into Washington than in that vicinity.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me a word right there?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is true that this water front, from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing down to the War College, is to be used for commerce. But there are two ways of using such a space for commerce. One is to allow it to be as ugly as most of our water fronts are in the United States; the other is to make it as attractive as the water fronts on the Thames, on the Seine, on the Rhine, and other great rivers are. There are two ways of making a thing useful—one is to make it as ugly as possible and the other is to make it as beautiful as possible, whilst at the same time taking care of utility.

The Senator is mistaken when he says that the Art Commission have not in contemplation the beautifying of this water front right from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing down to the War College, which, as we all know, is a very beautiful place. Here is the report of the Commission of Fine Arts.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I hope the Senator will not undertake to go into the pictures of the Art Commission. They make beautiful pictures on very little provocation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. On page 84 of this report the Senator will find No. 10:

Typical Treatment of Potomac Quay.

You will find there a most beautiful structure proposed to go along this water front, not developed, because at that time it was not known whether or not it was in the hands of the Government. It has since been determined that it is.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. What building is that?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is a structure. I will show the Senator——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I want the Senator to tell me what it is. I know, but I want the Senator to state what it is.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is not a building.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. What is it?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is an elevated esplanade, such as I have described.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. And the Senator thinks we ought to put an esplanade there that will stop all commerce coming into Washington?

THE POTOMAC TO BE TREATED LIKE THE THAMES AND THE SEINE.

Mr. NEWLANDS. No. The esplanade is so arranged that you can look down upon the activities of commerce below, as you do on the Thames, and as you do on the Seine. Does the Senator realize that fish houses and structures for every other kind of objectionable use, if you may term them such, are employed both on the Thames and on the Seine, and yet those embankments are created in such a way as to entirely conceal them from view, or to beautify them, and that those are the most extraordinary developments in the history of the world? That is what is proposed, and that is what this commission is proposing to do with reference to that very thing, and it is gradually perfecting the entire water front.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, they are simply drawing on their imagination and making pictures, but we are doing something. We are beautifying that place by putting a magnificent structure there, one that will be pleasing to the eye. There is nothing obnoxious to the eye in that building that is supposed to be put on the bank of the Potomac.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the Senator call that beautiful [exhibiting picture]?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is not the building. That is not what we are proposing to place there.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But that is the way that building will look.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. No; it will not look so at all.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The stacks will look that way.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. When it is constructed the Senator will see how it will look, and it will not look anything at all like that. There is a true picture [pointing to protograph]. That is an actual photograph. They had to get up on top of the Washington Monument to get a photograph of the scene. It is so retired and so remote and so secluded that they could not get a picture of it unless they went to the top of the Washington Monument and put the camera on it and took the picture from there, and that is the way it was done.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me say to the Senator that this is a picture of a structure that has been put up near a beautiful park at Detroit. The whole artistic sense of that community was aroused about it, and it will ultimately have to come down.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. We are not going to do anything like that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. This is something like it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Oh, no; there is what we are doing [pointing to picture]. It is shown over there, and it is not at all like that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, inasmuch as the chairman of the Fine Arts Commission lives in Detroit, I very much wonder that such a structure was allowed to be built there.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. He does not use his activities except at a distance.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; he has written about this and has told us what we ought to do in Washington.

Mr. NEWLANDS. There is a protest going on there, and it will have its effect, as this one will, one of these days.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator tells us, and has told us many times during this discussion, about the beauties of the Thames and the Seine. I have been there a good many times myself, and I am enough of an American to think Washington is prettier than either place.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It may be made so by the artists.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am not a landscape artist, but I have a right to my opinion as an American citizen, and I find more beauty in Washington than I find even in Paris, and certainly a great deal more than in London.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I will state that the plan of Washington has been absolutely saved through the Burnham Commission, and that the Burnham Commission, in perfecting this plan, spent months in Europe in studying the established models of the civilized world.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Yes; we learned a great deal from it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And the beauty that Washington presents to-day is largely the result of responding to artistic sentiment as it has existed throughout the ages.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. No doubt that is true, but we can teach them a good deal now.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I hope so. It is a commission of Americans, and I hope they will even improve upon what there is abroad. The trouble with the Senator is that he proposes to defeat the purpose of these artists, to whose great work he pays a great tribute in declaring that Washington is the most beautiful city in the world.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. No; we are going to protect it by putting this necessary utility in a retired and unobjectionable place, rather than follow the Senator's advice and bring it within two squares of the House Office Building and three squares of the National Capitol by putting it in Garfield Park, in a thickly populated residential section.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to say that I have no particular location in mind. What I say is that this Congress has already put a plant there; that it has two stacks, resembling these that the Senator proposes to erect, and that the plant there can be enlarged so as to embrace every public building in the District of Columbia. If there are to be monstrosities of this kind, do not let us duplicate them and triplicate them.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If you are going to move any, move that one away.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But if it should be decided that another plant of the kind should be erected, there are plenty of other sites besides that, if the Senator objects to utilizing the plant near the Capitol already established.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the Fine Arts Commission and the Senator from Nevada have pointed out no other site at which to put this utility except as an addition to the Capitol power plant, which is located in Garfield Park, three squares from the Capitol and two squares from the House Office Building.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Neither the Fine Arts Commission nor the Senator from Nevada assumes to know everything.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Well, the Senator assumes to know that. That is what he has told me repeatedly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. All that I ask, and all that they ask, is that the Congress of the United States should suspend for a short time its action on this matter, in order that experts of world-wide repute may look into this matter in connection with the Commission of Fine Arts, the whole matter to receive the final approval of the President, and if the President finally approves this plan as presented under this amendment the work will go on.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The President of the United States has finally approved this location and these plans, and he says the work ought to go on right there and now, and ought to be completed as quickly as possible.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But the President has not had, as the law requires, the benefit of the opinion of the Commission of Fine Arts, nor has he had the benefit of the opinion of experts upon the subject. We appeal to the informed judgment of the President of the United States, and not to his judgment when only one side has been heard.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the Senator draws on his imagination again when he says that only one side has been heard. If only one side has been heard, maybe it is the Senator's side. He has been to see the President. I have not. If the President ought to have further advice, who is his guardian? He says he has given the matter investigation, and has reached a conclusion. He is satisfied with it, and he wants this work to go on as planned, at the place where it is located. Who is his guardian to say that he must have some other advice? I am not.

THE MISTAKE OF CONGRESS.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, my position is that this plan was entered upon by Congress without, as I understand, the initiative of the Executive Department. Mr. Bernard Green made a report, and others have made reports. The matter has been handled by the Appropriations Committee of the House. They have undoubtedly, from the economic standpoint, exhausted or at all events largely covered the field of inquiry as to this building. I claim that they have never looked at it from the artistic standpoint and with reference to the general beautified plan of Washington.

If there has been a mistake in the selection of the site, it is not the mistake of the Executive Department. It is not the mistake of the Treasury Department. It is the mistake of Congress. What I object to is that the Executive Department is pulled in, in order to enable Congress to make up its own mind with reference to a matter upon which it has acted, and with reference to which it has a right, of course, to change its mind. Congress, I submit, should get the information to enable it to do it. All that this amendment does is to leave the President as the final arbiter; but it does insist upon the matter going through the proper course of expert inquiry.

The Senator from Virginia seems to think that I am forcing the action of the Executive. The difficulty I find with the situation is that an executive department is imposing itself upon the legislative department, and insisting that we have not the right to adopt a process of inquiry which may enable us to change our minds with reference to a matter which we have initiated and which we have prosecuted and with which we are concerned; that we are not even to have a few days' or a few weeks' suspension of action in order that the matter may be looked into properly. That is what I object to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The President is not forcing his views on the Senator from Nevada, because the Senator from Nevada has seen him and has discussed this matter with him and did not convince him, and he did not convince the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. No.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. So the President is not forcing his opinions on the Senator from Nevada. He certainly is not forcing them upon me, because my opinion was made up and my report was made before I heard what the President's view was. I acted on my own independent judgment as a Senator, and every other member of the committee acted on his own independent judgment. We were very much gratified to find that the President entertained the same opinion, but our opinion was made up and formulated and reported to the Senate before we ever heard anything from the President. I will acknowledge that it very greatly strengthened my faith in my convictions.

Mr. NEWLANDS. With reference to that, I have simply to say that throughout there has been no effort whatever to cast any discredit upon the executive department. Whilst an executive department has failed to obey the law, and has been guilty, according to the admission of its own officials, of an inadvertence, we have taken the charitable view, and the proper view in my judgment, that it was a mere inadvertence. There was an effort made by this society of architects to secure the influence of the President in intervening. That effort failed. I should be very glad, if the President would release the seal of confidence, to present to Congress the correspondence between the President and myself on that subject.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have no doubt he will do it. I have never known him to have anything which he wanted to withhold.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have not the slightest doubt but that propriety requires that course on my part.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. He has the right to have it given to the public, and I am sure he would be willing to do it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. There is nothing whatever in that correspondence, I trust, that reflects upon either of us. All I want is an unprejudiced, a nonpartisan, and a disinterested consideration of this question; and all I say is that Congress should want it, and Congress should not be blocked in having it by an executive department. That is all.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, so far as the President is concerned, I did not invite him to take up this matter because I knew he had troubles of his own, but the Senator from Nevada invited his jurisdiction, and I hope that he is satisfied with it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I am not satisfied with anything but a deliberate investigation and inquiry, with the aid of experts.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. You ought not to appeal for a decision and then kick on the result.
